QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

L. J. E., Blevins, Tenn. Is there any hope that the heathen who died without hearing of Christ may eventually have an opportunity of being saved?

As nothing is revealed to us in the Bible on the subject, it is useless to speculate about it. We may be quite sure that God will deal justly with them. Christ said (Luke 12:48), "He that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes." There can be no question of our duty in the matter, which is to preach the gospel to those still living. Those who are dead are in the hands of God, and of their fate, whatever we may hope, we can know nothing.

Dan Carpenter, Barry, Mo. Was the Babylonian captivity of seventy years a consequence of the people neglecting to observe the Sabbatical years?

The direct cause of the captivity was the repeated revolt of Judah against the power of Babylon. Relying on the help of Egypt, the king broke his promise of fidelity and refused to pay the tribute he had promised to pay. The prophets uttered many warnings against this suicidal course, and still more against the idolatry and accompanying immorality which prevailed. They assured the nation that, beset as Judah was, by dangers from her powerful neighbors, she would be safe, if only she would be faithful to God. But the king and people were continually forsaking him and turning to evil courses, until at last God gave them up to their enemies. This was the cause of the captivity. The neglect of the Sabbatic years, mentioned II. Chronicles 36:21, was only one of many provocations. The writer mentions it incidentally, to show that what the people would not do voluntarily, was done when they were carried away and the land rested seventy years.

M. M. G., New Mayville, Pa. Is it possible to live without sin?

For how long a time? There are hours and possibly days in the Christian experience, during which as it seems to us no conscious sin is committed. But we think few, if any, could point to a year in their lives in which there has been no sin. Temptation comes, or there is some moment when the flesh asserts its power, or when vigilance is relaxed and a sin is committed. The power of Christ to keep those who rely on him, free from sin, is never weakened, but there are times when we trust ourselves, and then we are liable to fall.

Martin R., Brooklyn, N. Y. What Pontiff was it who kicked off the crown of a kneeling monarch?

It is related of Pope Celestine III. (A. D. 1191) that in order to show his prerogative of making and unmaking kings, he kicked the crown off the head of Henry VI., Emperor of Germany, when the latter knelt to him.

B. W., Jersey City, N. J. Are the great foreign public libraries any larger than our own?

The great libraries of England, France and Germany are the accumulations of many generations, and therefore, need not be compared with our Smithsonian, Congressional, Astor, and other collections of comparatively recent date. Few American collections have anything like 100,000 volumes. The State library in Munich, Bavaria, has 900,000; Berlin Library, 800,000; Strasburg, 600,000, and the libraries of Hamburg, Dresden, Leipzig, Heidelberg and Wurzburg follow in diminishing ratio. Much larger than any of these are the collections at the British Museum, London, and Bibliotheque Nationale, Paris.

Mattie D., Covington, Ky. What are the names of the seven stars mentioned in Amos 5?

They are the Pleiades, and their names are Alcyone, Maia, Merope, Electra, Tayageta, Sterope and Celaemo. They are also called the Atlantides and the Hesperides.

E. W. T., Burdickville, Mich. Who are the children of the kingdom, who Christ said (Matt. 8:11, 12) would be cast out?

Primarily, Christ was referring to the Jews. They prided themselves on being the descendants of Abraham. He was warning them that their natural descent did not give them a title to enter the kingdom of God. There were other people whom they despised who, being regenerated, would be admitted to heaven, while they, in spite of natural descent from Abraham, would be cast out. His words also apply to people in Christian countries who having a knowledge of the things of God, do not live according to their knowledge. They, too, will see people who had not their advantages, admitted while they themselves are excluded.

GENERAL VIEW OF THE CITY OF OTTAWA, CAN.

Ottawa is the capital of the Dominion and of Carleton County, and has a population of over 50,030. The census of 1891 gave it as 44,154. It is the seat of government and the residence of the Governor-General. The city lies on the south bank of the Ottawa river. Many of the public buildings—notably the Parliament House, Public Library, and Rideau Hall, rank among the finest specimens of architecture on the American Continent. The photograph is taken from "Government Hill."

L. B., Pittsfield, Mass. 1. Should a child of nine years, who has been received into church fellowship, be allowed to partake of the Lord's Supper? 2. Does not a child violate a temperance pledge by communing at that age?

1. If the child was deemed fit for church-membership, there is no reason for forbidding him to come to the Lord's table. He who said, "Suffer little children to come unto me and forbid them not," would surely be pleased to see a child at his table, if the child has given his heart into his keeping. 2. All the temperance pledges we have seen permit the signer to drink wine at the Lord's Supper.

Ebb, Louisville, Kans. Is it the duty of a Christian to persevere in showing kindness to a neighbor, when that neighbor is ungrateful, and by misrepresentation alienates other friends? Or should he hold no further communication with such a neighbor?

There are cases of extreme misconduct which justify a complete severance of friendly relations (see Matthew 18:16, 17), but that is only a last resort, after other measures have failed. If you are trying to be like God, you will be kind "even to the unthankful and the evil." Perhaps by continuing your friendship you may redeem your neighbor. At least you will be setting him a good example in returning good for evil. If you can help him to be a better man, you will render him good service, and incidentally your own soul will be helped by the exercise. There is no need for intimate friendship, but both you and he would be the better for your continuing neighborly kindnesses.

Mrs. Charles O., Hull Prairie, Ohio. As I take your paper and am very much interested in its pages, I thought to address you for the purpose of ascertaining about the church at Porto Rico. I saw a piece telling about the church there and we would be glad to help in some way. We are a small church ourselves, but are doing quite well as we are prospered.

The intention is to open up Sunday School work in Porto Rico, and we are now making the necessary arrangements. Any sums sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for that work will be duly acknowledged and applied.

Wm. G., Wilmington, Del. Why is God's name not mentioned in the book of Esther?

It is supposed that the author was fearful of causing offence to persons in the Persian court, and possibly provoking a persecution of those Jews, who were then captives in Persia.

——, Montreal, Can. What is the difference between the Methodist, the Methodist Episcopal and the Episcopal churches?

Between the first two there is, we believe, no doctrinal difference. In England, the Wesleyan and Primitive Methodist churches are governed by general conferences. In the United States there is also a general conference, but bishops are elected to have the oversight of the churches. In England the Methodist churches have no bishops. The third church you mention is, we suppose, the Protestant Episcopal Church, which is practically identical with the Church of England. That also has bishops, but it differs from the Methodist churches in its services, having a liturgy, in its requirements as to membership and in its church government. From its thirty-nine articles, which any clergyman will show you, you can see wherein it differs from the Methodist Church.

L. M., St. Thomas, Ont. How could the Israelites in the wilderness tempt Christ, as stated in 1. Cor. 10:19, when they knew nothing about him?

The passage does not say that they tempted Christ. The Apostle urges his readers not to tempt Christ by such misconduct as the Israelites were guilty of. The wording of the Authorized Version is unfortunate, and the construction you put upon it has often been made. In the Revised Version, it reads, "tempt the Lord," which is more reasonable.

Subscriber, Selma, Cal. What is the cost and time required to train a Christian worker?

The cost of training at the Moody Institute is $100 a year. The time required is usually two years.

B. S., Holton, Kans. Does the prohibition in Rev. 22:18 against adding to or taking away, apply to that particular book or to the whole Bible? If the latter, is not the Revised Version, which does omit certain verses a violation of it?

It is generally believed to apply to the Book of Revelation. It is by no means certain that it was the last of the New Testament books written. The Gospel of John and the Epistle to the Hebrews, both appear to be of later date. If this is true, the prohibition could not apply to the whole Bible, as some parts of it were not written. In any case, the Revisers would not incur the penalty, as their whole effort was concentrated on making our version accurate and bringing it into accord with the oldest manuscripts in existence.

Reader, Hamilton, Can. Is there any sufficient reason why churches should not be kept open every day in the week, as a refuge for any person who wishes to spend a quiet moment?

Many churches are so kept open, but they are as a rule little used. If a majority, or even a large proportion of the membership of a church desired it, the matter could be easily arranged. Many people, however, are so favorably situated that they can secure privacy in their homes if they so desire, and can there enter into their closet and, shutting the door, commune with their Father. A prayer is not any the more likely to be heard for being presented in a church.

K. A. L., Richfield Springs, N. Y. When was the first census taken, of which history makes any record?

The earliest is believed to have been taken in China in 2042 B. C. Moses (about 1491 B. C.), laid down the law regulating the Israelitish census, which was probably taken after the Egyptain model. It is doubtful whether the most ancient census included the whole population, or had reference only to the property-owning or tax-paying portion. Slaves were probably omitted.

A. J., Stevens Point, Wis. Does God send evil spirits as implied in 1. Samuel 16:14?

The author of the book conceived of Saul's madness as a punishment from God, as it undoubtedly was. At that time, both mental and physical disease were attributed to evil spirits. It was, therefore, in accord with generally accepted ideas, for the writer to reconcile the two theories by representing God as sending the evil spirit. The mystery of evil we cannot solve, but we may be sure that in all the universe, there is no being beyond God's control.

M. McD., Des Moines, Ia. Is it a sin for a son or daughter, twenty-one years of age, to disobey their father and mother?

The injunction to filial obedience is not affected by age. (See Eph. 6:1.) After a child has reached manhood or womanhood, however, the paternal authority should be relaxed to suit changed conditions and responsibilities. Any command by the parent which conflicts with the conscience of the young man or woman, may be set aside. (Matt. 10:35; Eph. 6:1-4; Col. 3:21.) When a child has reached the age of discretion, there is no moral compulsion to obey an unrighteous command, even though given by a parent.

ON THE GREAT ALASKAN TRAIL

Philanthropic and Christian Work Among the Miners—Preaching the Gospel in Tents, on Icy Highways and on the Great Glaciers — A Battle with Mosquitoes — Honest Indians and Dishonest Whites—An Interesting Letter From a Traveler on the Trail

AMONG the many thousands who have gone to Alaska during the last twelve months, there are probably less than a score who have not been lured thither by the passion for gold. Those rare exceptions are the little handful of devoted Gospel workers, who have braved the icy dangers of that frigid land for what is infinitely more precious than the product of the richest mines—for the sake of winning souls to Christ. Our readers will be interested in the following account (written by one of those missionary laborers), of the work now carried on in the famous Copper River Valley of Alaska, and along the trail into the interior:

REV. F. L. BENEDICT

"Almost every profession is represented among the multitude attracted to that country. I found preachers, lawyers, doctors, teachers, brokers, and mechanics of all trades. It was not a conglomerate mass of hoodlums, but men of families—respectable men, with loved ones at home who were mindful of the absent. The work began on board the steamer bound for Valdes, situated on the most northerly arm of Prince William Sound. Services were held in the cabin of the steamer, to which nearly all of the seventy odd passengers came and listened to the 'Old, old Story.' At the close of the service, on the suggestion of one of the men, an offering was taken (amounting to $6.75), and it was voted to use this in mission work in Alaska.

"After the service, a large number of the men introduced themselves to me. I found men of all denominations, some of whom were officials in church societies at home. They showed much interest in the prospect of having divine services on the trail and in the interior wherever a settlement was founded. Many of the men gave me their personal pledge of support, both in building a chapel and in carrying on the work; but alas! all those gilt-lined hopes have vanished as the mist before the sun, and many of those men are home again.

"A few days after landing at Valdes, a Christian Endeavor Society was organized with a membership of about fifteen. That it still exists, the accompanying photograph bears evidence. At first services were held in an eight-by-ten tent; but it was too small, and after a time a large tent was secured. Still later, a log cabin was erected, and in this building services are held each Sabbath. Nor did the society confine itself within the walls of that snug log cabin; but reached out to grander achievements. A tent was placed on the glacier at a convenient point, where men, returning from the interior over the glacier, could find shelter and good warm blankets to sleep in. This work of love alone has been the means of lessening the hardships to be encountered in a trip across the glacier during the summer; and possibly in the saving of life.

"As to the services on the trail, they were held as often as possible, and genuine interest was manifested. The men wore their hats; so did the preacher. The air being quite cool, this was necessary, but when the preacher removed his hat during the prayer, every other hat came off reverently.

"It may seem a simple thing, but it was very impressive, and when we prayed, 'God watch between us and our loved ones at home,' many a brawny hand stole toward the eye, to wipe away a tear. It was the time of all times, when we thought of home. Some of the men had their Bibles with them. In fact, there were very few men on the trail who did not have a Bible or Testament.

AN AUCTION SALE ON THE VALDES TRAIL

THREE SONS OF CHIEF STICKWAN

AN INDIAN SQUAW AND CHILD

"There was an odd incident connected with one of our services during the summer. It was a sultry day—hardly a breath of air was stirring—consequently, the mosquitoes were every where. The meeting, which was well attended, was no sooner opened than preacher and congregation were set upon by myriads of these pests. The northern mosquito has a method of presenting its bill, peculiarly its own. There is no harp-string solo to lull the victims to passive moods; he seems to come at you with his suction pump extended, much after the fashion of a ram. When he lights, it is usually with sufficient force to cause this ram to penetrate the skin; and he is down to business in an instant. For a time it seemed as though we would have to disband.

"There were several funerals on the trail, at two of which the preacher officiated. One was a Catholic, but the trail is a place where denominational lines are wholly obliterated. We were not Presbyterians, Methodists, Baptists, or even Catholics there; we were men away from home and loved ones; away from the sanctuary, and its blessed privileges, and we wanted spiritual comfort for our lonely hearts, so we worked along the line of thought in II. Cor. 1:3, 4.

"The Indians of that region belong to the Greek Church, and, although they have no places of worship, yet they are strong in their faith. We had read of the 'savages' on the Copper River, and that many massacres had occurred; but from what evidence we were able to gather, it is believed the massacres were on the part of the perpetrators of the story, and that they frightfully massacred the truth. The fact of the matter is, most of the Indians have more truth and honesty about them than many white men. Chief Stickwan preached one of the most powerful sermons on stealing that we had heard. Some thieving white men had broken into a cache belonging to the chief. When he discovered the theft he was angry, and came over to a large camp to let the white man know that such things would not be tolerated. His English vocabulary was very limited, but he managed, by acting out his thought, to preach a sound lesson. Pointing toward his cache, he said, 'White man, steal gun, furs.' It seemed a shot-gun and a few of his best furs were gone, the thief, or thieves having gained an entrance by deliberately breaking the door from its hinges. Looking fiercely on the attentive group, he repeated, 'White man steal, white man no good!' Then, throwing down on the ground his knife and a few other things, he very dramatically pointed to them, and in his best English, said: 'Indian leave.' Flourishing his hand he then added, 'Indian go way. Bym-by, Indian back. Find there. Indian no steal. White man steal. White man no good!' I think the reader will be able to gather the idea. It is this: When an Indian left anything along the trail, he could always find it where he had put it, for no other Indian would touch it; but the white man, seeing the things apparently without an owner, appropriates them to his own use.

"It would not have been safe for the thief, had he been found in that camp. There was some talk of finding him and shooting him in the presence of the Indians, to let them understand how the white man regarded a thief. It was never executed, however. The men did all that was in their power, and gave the chief flour and clothing.

"Sometime after this occurrence, Chief Stickwan came into my tent to buy sugar. I sold him a dollar's worth, and when he handed me the money, I gave half of it to my partner, and it seemed to puzzle him. Looking curiously at me, he touched my knee with his hand, saying, with gesture, 'Why.' I tried to make him understand he was my partner. He seemed to grasp the idea, and patting me on the knee, he said, 'Good.' I told the old chief that all white men did not steal. He grasped the idea, and quickly replied, holding up two fingers, 'No, two white men, steal.'

THE ENDEAVOR LOG CABIN

"At another time, when Stickwan and his wife had their picture taken, he pointed at the kodak, then at himself, and asked, 'me die?' He thought, in his superstition, that to have his picture taken, would, in some way, bewitch him, and he would die. When, however, it was explained to him that when he did die his wife could see his picture, he was comforted, and smiled his sweetest for the kodak. It took the combined efforts of four of us, for half an hour, to make him understand this.

"The Indians of that country are fast dying out. Nearly every one we met had a consumptive cough, and asked repeatedly for medicine. F. L. BENEDICT."

A COPPER RIVER INDIAN FAMILY

[Rev. F. L. Benedict, our correspondent, left the Franklin Street Presbyterian Church, at Elmira, N. Y., to undertake mission work in the gold fields of Alaska, hoping, if possible, to support himself, and to be aided by the miners. The Presbytery sanctioned the movement, and every preacher he consulted advised him to go. No gold was found, and nearly all the miners returned, leaving not more than 300 to winter there, and these anticipated proceeding up the Copper River and over the divide into the Yukon country. Mr. Benedict could get no support from the Presbyterian Board because of a lack of funds, and the miners were helpless themselves. No permanent work could be carried on in the Copper River district, so he returned.]

A Curious Tree

There is a curious tree in Australia known as the "Angry Tree." It grows rapidly, reaching usually the height of eighty feet. At sunset the leaves fold up and the tender twigs coil tightly. If the shoots are handled the leaves rustle and move uneasily for a time. If this queer plant is moved from one spot to another, the leaves stand out in all directions, like the quills on a porcupine. A most pungent and sickening odor, said to esemble that given off by rattlesnakes when angered, fills the air, and it is only after an hour or so that the leaves fold in the natural way. Some unfortunate people are, by nature, as irritable as this tree. It is useless to bid them "control" the disposition. Their only help is in a change of nature which comes through [illegible] on the loving power of Christ.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

A New Year's Greeting

A New Year's Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: Genesis 47: 8, ... } How old art thou?

THE Egyptian capital was the focus of the world's wealth. In ships and barges there had been brought to it from India frank incense and cinnamon and ivory and diamonds; from the north, marble and iron; from Syria, purple and silks; from Greece, some of the finest horses of the world, and some of the most brilliant chariots; and from all the earth that which could best please the eye, and charm the ear and gratify the taste. There were temples aflame with red sandstone, entered by the gateways that were guarded by pillars bewildering with hieroglyphics and wound with brazen serpents and adorned with winged creatures—their eyes and beaks and pinions glittering with precious stones. There were marble columns blooming into white flower-beds; there were stone pillars, at the top bursting into the shape of the lotus when in full bloom.

Along the avenues, lined with sphinx and fane and obelisk, there were princes who came in gorgeously upholstered palanquins, carried by servants in scarlet, or elsewhere drawn by vehicles, the snow-white horses, golden-bitted, and six abreast, dashing at full run. On floors of moasic the glories of Pharaoh were spelled out in letters of porphyry and beryl and flame. There were ornaments twisted from the wood of tamarisk, embossed with silver breaking into foam. There were footstools made out of a single precious stone. There were beds fashioned out of a crouched lion in bronze. There were chairs spotted with the sleek hides of leopards. There were sofas footed with the claws of wild beasts, and armed with the beaks of birds. As you stand on the level beach of the sea on a summer day, and look either way, and there are miles of breakers, white with the ocean foam, dashing shoreward, so it seemed as if the sea of the world's pomp and wealth in the Egyptian capital for miles and miles flung itself up into white breakers of marble temple, mausoleum and obelisk.

It was to this capital and the palace of Pharaoh that Jacob, the plain shepherd, came to meet his son Joseph, who had become Prime Minister, in the royal apartment. Pharaoh and Jacob met, dignity and rusticity, the gracefulness of the court and the plain manners of the field. The king, wanting to make the old countryman at ease, and seeing how white his beard is and how feeble his step, looks familiarly into his face and says to the aged man: "How old art thou?"

Last night the gate of Eternity opened to let in, amid the great throng of departed centuries, the soul of the dying year. Under the twelfth stroke of the brazen hammer of the city clock the patriarch fell dead, and the stars of the night were the funeral torches. It is most fortunate that on this road of life there are so many mile-stones, on which we can read just how fast we are going toward the journey's end. I feel that it is not an inappropriate question that I ask to-day, when I look into your faces, and say, as Pharaoh did to Jacob, the patriarch: "How old art thou?"

People who are truthful on every other subject lie about their ages, so that I do not solicit from you any literal response to the question I have asked. I would put no one under temptation; but I simply want, this morning, to see by what rod it is we are measuring our earthly existence. There is a right way and a wrong way of measuring a door, or a wall or an arch, or a tower; and so there is a right way and a wrong way of measuring our earthly existence. It is with reference to this higher meaning that I confront you this morning with the stupendous question of the text, and ask: "How old art thou?"

There are many who estimate their life by mere worldly gratification. When Lord Dundas was wished a happy New Year, he said: "It will have to be a happier year than the past, for I hadn't one happy moment in all the twelve months that have gone." But that has not been the experience of most of us. We have found that though the world is blasted with sin, it is a very bright and beautiful place to reside in. We have had joys innumerable. There is no hostility between the gospel and the merriments and the festivities of life. I do not think that we fully enough appreciate the worldly pleasures God gives us. How many joys have breathed up to you from the flowers, and shone down to you from the stars, and chanted to you with the voice of soaring bird, and tumbling cascade, and booming sea, and thunders that with bayonets of fire charged down the mountain-side! Joy! Joy! Joy! If there is any one who has a right to the enjoyments of the world, it is the Christian, for God has given him a lease of everything in the promise: "All are yours." But I have to tell you that a man who estimates his life on earth by mere worldly gratification is a most unwise man. Our life is not to be a game of chess. It is not a dance in lighted hall, to quick music. It is not the froth of an ale-pitcher. It is not the settlings of a wine-cup. It is not a banquet, with intoxication and roystering. It is the first step on a ladder that mounts into the skies, or the first step on a road that plunges into a horrible abyss. "How old art thou?" Toward what destiny are you tending, and how fast are you getting on toward it?

Again, I remark that there are many who estimate their life on earth by their sorrows and misfortunes. Through a great many of your lives the ploughshare hath gone very deep, turning up a terrible furrow. You have been betrayed, and misrepresented, and set upon, and slapped of impertinence, and pounded of misfortune. The brightest life must have its shadows, and the smoothest path its thorns. On the happiest brood the hawk pounces. No escape from trouble of some kind.

And yet it is unfair to measure a man's life by his misfortunes, because where there is one stalk of nightshade there are fifty marigolds and harebells; where there is one cloud thunder-charged, there are hundreds that stray across the heavens, the glory of land and sky, asleep in their bosom. Because death came and took your child away, did you immediately forget all the five years, or the ten years, or the fifteen years, in which she came every night for a kiss, all the tones of your heart pealing forth at the sound of her voice or the soft touch of her hand? Because in some financial Euroclydon your fortune went into the breakers, did you forget all those years in which the luxuries and extravagances of life showered on your pathway? Alas, that is an unwise man, an ungrateful man, an unfair man, an unphilosophic man, and, most of all, an unchristian man, who measures his life on earth by groans, and tears, and abuse, and scorn, and neuralgic thrust.

Again, I remark that there are many people who estimate their life on earth by the amount of money they have accumulated. They say, "The year 1866, or 1870, or 1898, was wasted." Why? "Made no money." Now, it is all cant and insincerity to talk against money, as though it had no value. It may represent refinement, and education, and ten thousand blessed surroundings. It is the spreading of the table that feeds the children's hunger. It is the lighting of the furnace that keeps you warm. It is the making of the bed on which you rest from care and anxiety. It is the carrying of you out at last to decent sepulchre, and the putting up of the slab on which is chiseled the story of your Christian hope. It is simply hypocrisy, this tirade in pulpit and lecture-hall against money.

But while all this is so, he who uses money or thinks of money as anything but a means to an end, will find out his mistake when the glittering treasures slip out of his nerveless grasp, and he goes out of this world without a shilling of money or a certificate of stock. He might better have been the Christian porter that opened his gate, or the begrimed workman who last night heaved the coal into his cellar. Bonds and mortgages and leases have their use, but they make a poor yardstick with which to measure life. "They that boast themselves in their wealth and trust in the multitude of their riches, none of them can, by any means, redeem his brother, or give to God a ransom for him, that he should not see corruption."

But I remark, there are many—I wish there were more—who estimate their life by their moral and spiritual development.

It is not sinful egotism for a Christian man to say, "I am purer than I used to be. I am more consecrated to Christ than I used to be. I have got over a great many of the bad habits in which I used to indulge. I am a great deal better man than I used to be." There is no sinful egotism in that. There are Christian men here who have become swarthy by hammering at the forge of calamity. They stand on an entirely different plane of character from that which they once occupied. They are measuring their life on earth by golden-gated Sabbaths, by pentecostal prayer-meetings, by communion-tables, by baptismal fonts, by hallelujahs in the temple. The darkest night their soul is irradiated, as was the night over Bethlehem, by the faces of those who have come to proclaim glory and good cheer. They are only waiting for the gate to open and the chains to fall off and the glory to begin.

I remark again: There are many—and I wish there were more—who are estimating life by the good they can do.

John Bradford said he counted that day nothing at all in which he had not, by pen or tongue, done some good. If a man begin right, I cannot tell how many tears he may wipe away, how many burdens he may lift, how many orphans he may comfort, how many outcasts he may reclaim. There have been men who have given their whole life in the right direction, concentrating all their wit and ingenuity and mental acumen and physical force and enthusiasm for Christ. They climbed the mountain and delved into the mine and crossed the sea and trudged the desert and dropped, at last, into martyr's graves, waiting for the resurrection of the just. They measured their lives by the chains they broke off, by the garments they put upon nakedness, by the miles they traveled to alleviate every kind of suffering. They felt in the thrill of every nerve, in the motion of every muscle, in every throb of their heart, in every respiration of their lungs, the magnificent truth: "No man liveth unto himself." They went through cold and through heat, foot-blistered, cheek-smitten, back-scourged, tempest-lashed, to do their whole duty. That is the way they measured life—by the amount of good they could do.

Now, I do not know what your advantages or disadvantages are; I do not know what your tact or talent is; I do not know what may be the fascination of your manners or the repulsiveness of them: but I know this: there is for you, my hearer, a field to culture, a harvest to reap, a tear to wipe away, a soul to save. If you have worldly means, consecrate them to Christ. If you have eloquence, use it on the side that Paul and Wilberforce used theirs. If you have learning, put it all into the poor box of the world's suffering. But if you have none of these—neither wealth, nor eloquence, nor learning—you, at any rate, have a smile with which you can encourage the disheartened; a frown with which you may blast injustice; a voice with which you may call the wanderer back to God. "Oh," you say, "that is a very sanctimonious view of life!" It is not. It is the only bright view of life, and it is the only bright view of death. Contrast the death-scene of a man who has measured life by the worldly standard with the death-scene of a man who has measured life by the Christian standard. Or, compare it with the Christian death-bed that you witnessed in your own household. Oh, my friends, this world is a false god! It will consume you with the blaze in which it accepts your sacrifice, while the righteous shall be held in everlasting remembrance, and when the thrones have fallen, and the monuments have crumbled, and the world has perished, they shall banquet with the hierarchs of heaven.

This is a good day in which to begin a new style of measurement. How old art thou? You see the Christian way of measuring life and the worldly way of measuring it. I leave it to you to say which is the wisest and best way. The wheel of time has turned very swiftly, and it has hurled us on. The old year has gone. The new year has come. For what you and I have been launched upon it, God only knows. Now let me ask you all. Have you made any preparation for the future? You have made preparation for time, my dear brother; have you made any preparation for eternity? Do you wonder that when that man on the Hudson River, in indignation, tore up the tract which was handed to him, and just one word landed on his coat-sleeve—the rest of the tract being pitched into the river—that one word aroused his soul? It was that one word, so long, so broad, so high, so deep—"eternity!" A dying woman, in her last moments, said, "Call it back." They said, "What do you want?" "Time," she said, "call it back!" Oh, it cannot be called back! We might lose our fortunes and call them back; we might lose our health, and, perhaps, recover it; we might lose our good name and get that back; but time gone is gone forever.

Some of you, during the past year, made preparation for eternity, and it makes no difference to you really, as to the matter of safety, whether you go now or go some other year—whether this year or the next year. Both your feet on the rock, the waves may dash around you. You can say, "God is our refuge and strength—a very present help." You are on the rock, and you may defy all earth and hell to overthrow you. I congratulate you. I give you great joy. It is a happy new year to you.

I can see no sorrow at all in the fact that our years are going. You hear some people say, "I wish I could go back again to boyhood." I would not want to go back again to boyhood. I am afraid I might make a worse life out of it than I have made. You could not afford to go back to boyhood if it were possible. You might do a great deal worse than you have done. The past is gone! Look out for the future! To all Christians it is a time of gladness. I am glad the years are going. You are coming on nearer home. Let your countenance light up with the thought. Nearer home!

Does not our common-sense teach us that it is better to be at the centre than to be clear out on the rim of the wheel, holding nervously fast to the tire lest we be suddenly hurled into light, and eternal felicity? Through all kinds of optical instruments trying to peer in through the cracks and the keyholes of heaven—afraid that both doors of the celestial mansion will be swung wide open before our entranced vision—rushing about among the apothecary shops of this world, wondering if this is good for rheumatism, and that is good for neuralgia, and something else is good for a bad cough, lest we be suddenly ushered into a land of everlasting health where the inhabitant never says, "I am sick."

In 1835 the French resolved that at Ghent they would have a kind of musical demonstration that had never been heard of. It would be made up of the chimes of bells and the discharge of cannon. The experiment was a perfect success. What with the ringing of the bells and the report of the ordnance, the city trembled, and the hills shook with the triumphal march that was as strange as it was overwhelming. With a most glorious accompaniment will God's dear children go into their high residence, when the trumpets shall sound and the Last Day has come. At the signal given, the bells of the towers, and of the lighthouses, and of the cities, will strike their sweetness into a last chime that shall ring into the heavens and float off upon the sea, joined by the boom of bursting mine and magazine, augmented by all the cathedral towers of heaven—the harmonies of earth and the symphonies of the celestial realm making up one great triumphal march, fit to celebrate the ascent of the redeemed to where they shall shine as the stars forever and ever.

FEEDING HAVANA'S POOR

President McKinley Orders Supplies of Food and Medicine to be Distributed Forthwith Through the War Department—Private Co-operation Invited—Opening Gospel Work

IN pursuance of the policy long since announced with regard to relief work in Cuba, President McKinley has issued an order to the Secretary of War, directing that commissary, quartermaster and medical supplies be immediately distributed to the starving Cubans in Havana and Guines. Although these two places are named in the official order, it is understood that the relief is by no means to be confined to Havana and vicinity, but will be extended to all parts of the island, wherever the need is found to exist. Secretary Alger has communicated the order to Gen. Lee, commanding Havana Province, urging that it be carried out without delay.

It is learned that the need of the Cuban poor was very urgently brought to the President's attention recently by reliable persons who had just returned from that island, and who represented the distress in Havana Province as being widespread and appalling. After issuing the order to the War Department, setting the relief work in operation, the President, it is said, expressed the hope that the people of the United States would aid in the work, and that every charitable organization and individual would co-operate. He had nearly completed an arrangement with Gen. Garcia before the latter's death for the payment of $100 to each soldier in the Cuban Army, and he thought that much of this money would be used by the men themselves for buying oxen and ploughs. This would probably amount to some $2,000,000 and if half of it was used for this purpose, it would go far toward supplying this great agricultural need. This money was not to be taken from the United States Treasury, but was to be advanced on pledge of return from the revenues collected at the Custom House in Havana.

In the western part of the island, it is reliably learned that the conditions among the poor are much better than in Havana and vicinity, and that ample rations are supplied at Santiago and other points to prevent the possibility of any of the Cubans suffering by hunger.

THE Y. M. C. A. TENT AT MANILA

To Begin Gospel Work in Cuba

"TRANSPORT Michigan, Dec. 13.

"Editor 'The Christian Herald':

"As soon as orders came for the departure of the 7th Army Corps to Havana, the Army Y. M. C. A., which has been with the 7th Corps since the war broke out, made preparations to leave with them. An order was issued by Gen. Lee, and also by Adj.-Gen. Corbin for the free transportation of all supplies, including those of the Secretary. I have been the Secretary in the 2nd Illinois Regiment since last summer, when the regiment was stationed in Jacksonville, Fla. We moved to Savannah, Ga., in October, and our stay there will long be remembered in the hearts of the men on account of the kindness shown to us by the people of Savannah. Wealthy and cultured ladies would leave their beautiful homes, and come out to the camps. Thanksgiving day they furnished a fine dinner to the entire army, and even came out to the camps to serve it. The spiritual welfare of the men was also well looked after. Services were held by prominent ministers and evangelists. Many of the men came forward and resolved to lead better lives. I have seen many touching incidents—one in particular, which I wish to relate. It was at a Sunday afternoon service. The speaker had been referring to the homes and mothers of the men. After the meeting, I spoke to a young soldier. He was anxious to talk with me, and said he was worse than a drunkard. He was a gambler, and the vice had taken a terrible hold upon him. He said he had a good mother, and showed me a letter from her, begging him to be a good boy. He was open to conviction, and I talked to him of Jesus, who can help us overcome all things. I asked him to pray for forgiveness. With tears running down his cheeks, and sobs shaking his body, he bowed his head and prayed. Then I prayed with him, and I believe there was joy in heaven that day over one saved soul.

"On our departure from Savannah, the 2nd Illinois regiment was assigned to the transport Michigan, and on Friday, December 9, they marched down to the wharf to embark. There was some delay and confusion about loading, so that it was Saturday night before we sailed down the river. It was a cold and rainy day. The transport was formerly a cattle ship, and was not in good condition to carry men. They were packed in like sheep. On account of the small capacity, we were obliged to leave one battalion behind. When once out to sea, the weather was better. We expect to reach Havana to-night. The temperature is seventy-two degrees in the shade. On account of the crowded condition of the men, we couldn't hold a service, but the chaplain, Dr. Bolton, has been busy taking to the men.

"As soon as we land in Havana, I shall have a large tent put up, and do all I can for the comfort of the men. If the people of the north could only realize the dangers the men are exposed to morally, I am sure they would do all they could to keep up this work. I believe it is the only way of saving many a boy from ruin. I am going where I know there will be many harships and dangers. I am almost alone in my mission; but I love the boys, and if need be, I am willing to die trying to help them lead a better life. My prayer is that you will not forget your boys in Cuba. E. H. CHAPIN,"

Y. M. C. A. Work at Manila

From far-off Manila comes the news that Y. M. C. A. work in the Philippines has actually opened. Messrs. Chas. A. Glunz and F. A. Jackson, writing to the Association in New York City, under recent date, says:

We have three meetings on Sundays: at 10:00, 3:00 and 7:30, with sermons by chaplains, and prayer-meetings Thursday evenings. Frank held a service with the Third Artillery, across the river, last Sunday evening, and on Wednesday evening organized a Y. M. C. A., which we expect to complete this evening.

The troops are doing guard duty all over the city, so are quite scattered, companies being placed in different sections. All the police and fire stations are being used, as well as a number of the barracks. There being no available buildings near the centre of the city, owing to the crowded condition of the troops, we have made application for ground near the large bridge across the Pasig river, upon which to erect our tent. This will be in a central location, and will be handy for many men.

THE MUSIC OF SYRIA.

MUSIC had its birth in the Orient, and from the days of Jubal to the present time, a multitude of skilful methods of producing the "concord of sweet sounds" has been devised, many of which are still in use. It has been remarked by critics that the music of the East, with the exception of the Hebrew, is plaintive in character. Our illustration on the first page of this issue presents a scene that will be recognized by many who have traveled in the East. It is a group of Syrian singers—traveling musicians—of the class who perform for public or private entertainment. In Syrian homes, music often forms a prominent feature of the hospitality, and the zither (or an instrument closely resembling it), the tambourine and drum are used on such occasions. Syrian vocalism is usually rather shrill, but pleasanter to the ear than Arab singing, which is doleful in the extreme. Such a concert of voices and instruments, as our photograph represents, would probably be enjoyed by European or American auditors more as a unique feature of Oriental social life than as a musical treat. The picturesque figures, the weird and often discordant music, and the charm of the old-world surroundings, combine to make it sufficiently interesting, wholly apart from considerations of musical culture. Sometimes the strain is a grave, dignified, or cheerful one, but never sprightly, and there is in it no quality of genuine gayety such as is found in the music of the West. The Hebrews alone have preserved and developed the wondrous musical genius which had its birth in ancient Egypt and Assyria, but which, save among the Chosen Race, seems to have long ago died out in the Orient.

These Syrian musical itinerants have much in common with the wandering minstrels of colder climes. The old "minnesingers" and harpers of Europe sang of great heroes and glorious victories, and they kept alive in song many a tale and tradition that must otherwise have been forgotten. In the East, too, the vagrant players sometimes tell, in their droning recitative, of the deeds of other days. The Arab story-teller, like the singer, delights to laud bravery and daring. But in a majority of instances, the music evoked by the itinerants is a simple, thrumming melody, accompanied by a chant, which is often apparently as meaningless as it is unmusical.

THE LEPER MISSIONARY

The Extraordinary Recovery from Leprosy of Miss Mary Reed, of Pithoragarh, India

MANY of our readers were deeply interested in the thrilling story of Mary Reed, the leper missionary, which Dr. Louis Albert Banks told in this journal on June 9, 1897. They will be delighted to hear the sequel to that story which has just been received with a photograph of the lady, which we reproduce in this column.

Miss Reed is a native of Lowell, Washington Co., O., where she was born December, 1854. For several years she taught school in neighboring towns, until the Women's Foreign Missionary Society, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, accepted her offer to go as a missionary to India. She arrived in that land September, 1884, and began work at Cawnpore.

It will be remembered that Miss Reed, who had been laboring among the lepers of India, was on her way to her home in Ohio for a brief period of rest and recuperation, when she saw, with consternation, spots on her hand and arm which she recognized as the first symptoms of leprosy. She had seen too many victims of the dread disease to have any doubt about the nature of the malady which produced these ominous spots. But in order to satisfy others, she consulted eminent specialists in London and Paris, and they confirmed her own diagnosis.

She immediately came to the conclusion that her terrible condition was a direct indication of God's will as to her future course. Instead of collapsing under the discovery and lamenting the evil which was blasting her young life, she turned her face toward the abode of those similarly afflicted, and promptly returned to India to give her life to service among the lepers. On her arrival her friends were inexpressibly shocked to learn the cause of her sudden and unexpected return. They begged her to consult the famous brigade-surgeon of India, Dr. J. H. Condon, whose knowledge of the diseases of India is unsurpassed. To content them she consented, though she foresaw the opinion he unhesitatingly pronounced, that she was undoubtedly a leper. He gave her the usual directions and prescribed for her the remedies which alleviate the sufferings of the victims of the disease. Miss Reed also asked the prayers of her friends and then, bidding them farewell forever, went direct to the leper settlement at Pithoragarh, to give the remainder of her days to ministry among the afflicted inmates.

For some months past the letters that have reached her Ohio home from her retreat, have described her health as wonderfully improving. Now, to the surprise and joy of her friends, there has come extraordinary news. Miss Reed has paid another visit to Dr. Condon, and to his own surprise as much as to that of all who know her case, he pronounces her cured. "I am cured," Miss Reed writes, "not by medicines, but by the Great Physician in answer to prayer." So marvelous a recovery is a matter for devout thankfulness, and it will bring joy to the many people in this land, who have made her case a matter of prayer.

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

CHRIST'S FIRST MIRACLE

S. S. Lesson for January 15. John 2: 1-11

Golden Text, John 2: 11

BY REV. W. HAYES.

OUR Lord's temptation seems to have closely followed his baptism by John the Baptist (Matt. 3: 13-17; 4: 1-11). He had now returned to Galilee, from whence he had come to Bethabara beyond Jordan (John 1: 28), where John the Baptist had borne testimony to him, and where he had called his first disciples. Returned then to Galilee, he was called, and his disciples who had followed him thither, to a marriage. The very fact of the presence of our Lord on such an occasion is evidence that as "the express image" of the Father (Heb. 1: 3), he blesses marriage, and looks with no favor upon the enforced celibacy of superstitious religions.

The mother of our Lord saw that there was a difficulty. Probably they were very poor, and the small means at their disposal had left much to be desired in the supply; they had not the usual supply of wine. What should she do? Her first impulse was to turn to Jesus. No record of any miraculous power in his previous life is recorded in Holy Scripture, but his mother knew that his very existence was a miracle: "That holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God" (Luke 1: 35). Mary knew that her Son was the Messiah, however much appearances were against it, and there was an evident expectation on her part of some deliverance from him out of her present difficulty. Mary did right to appeal to him, but wherever true faith exists, it must be tested, and the answer of Jesus, which sounds like a rebuff, brought her into the true position to receive the help she needed. "Woman, what have I to do with thee? Mine hour is not yet come."

"Woman!" It was not "mother." And yet up to the time of his baptism and public ministry, in all probability he had called her mother. After the incident in the temple when, in the midst of the doctors of the law, he had caused astonishment by his understanding of the Scriptures and his answers, he had gone down with Joseph and Mary to Nazareth, and "was subject unto them" (Luke 2: 51). But now he was in no sense in his minority. For a long time after his majority at twelve years of age, even until he was thirty, he had continued in a subordinate position. But now although subject still, it was no more to Joseph, but to his Father in heaven. And Mary must learn now that the time had come when she must take her hands off him: and that in relation to his ministry she had no authority.

"Woman, what have I to do with thee? Mine hour is not yet come." Mary's object was to make use of the power which she believed was in Jesus to serve her own ends, and extricate herself from a difficulty. But we must never come to God as though he were our servant, as though he existed for us. Things are quite out of course when we act thus. "After this manner therefore pray ye, Our Father which art in heaven, hallowed be thy name, thy kingdom come, thy will be done." And then, "Give us this day our daily bread," etc. Always and in everything, God first. Even the virgin Mary had to learn this lesson. Oh, how many prayers are unanswered from this very fact that we have not really put God first, nor left to him what he shall do, how he shall do it, and when he shall do it. We have presumed to dictate to the most high God, and until we have learned to take our true position as deserving nothing, and as coming only through the merits of Jesus, and seeking first the glory of God in what we ask, his time is not come to answer.

Fully and quickly the mother of Jesus learned her lesson, and turning to the servants, she said, "Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it." There was not a shade of wounded feeling, no self-pity that she had to yield. Like John the Baptist, she must decrease as her divine Son must increase, and she simply yielded up to him the whole situation, and gave up the very control of the servants to him. Jesus had waited only for this. Truly now his hour was come. All was ripe now. His mother, the servants, the governor of the feast, all would now be blessed.

"Fill the waterpots with water." The command was instantly obeyed: the servants filled five waterpots of stone, which were standing there, up to the brim. "Draw out now and bear unto the governor of the feast." No word had been spoken to bring it about, no action on the part of Jesus, and yet the water was water no longer; it had become wine!

What a lesson for us as to the ways of God. When all is ripe: when we come over on to his side of a matter, then he can go forward and do his mighty works. But when we pray and clamor for things to be done in our own way and in our own time, we hinder him who hath made all things beautiful in his time (Eccl. 3: 11). As soon as we will, with God, understand God, enter into his purposes, and walk continually with him, God undertakes. Everything changes its nature as soon as it passes out of our hands into the hands of God. Our poor resources are just like the water, which in the hands of God becomes the new wine of the kingdom.

The ruler, or steward of the feast, tasted the water that was made wine, and knew not whence it was, but the servants which drew the water knew. They had learned that without a word and without an action, power had gone out from Jesus. Then the ruler of the feast called the bridegroom and said unto him, "Every man at the beginning doth set forth good wine; and when men have well drunk, then that which is worse; but thou hast kept the good wine until now." Yes indeed, all that is human, and all that is earthly, has a tendency to deteriorate.

This beginning of miracles did Jesus in Cana of Galilee, and manifested forth his glory, and his disciples believed on him. How close is this connection with the opening petitions in the Lord's Prayer! "He manifested forth his glory." "Hallowed be thy name." If in our petitions, our main desire is that his name may be hallowed, that he may manifest forth his glory, we shall not insist that God shall answer us in our time and in our way, [illegible] and he waits generally for us to come into line with him. He makes all things work together for good to them that love him, to them that are the called according to his purpose, i. e., that they should be conformed to the image of his Son. If we are one with him in the great purpose of his unspeakable grace, we shall have patience to wait until his hour is come, and then worry, anxiety, impatience and despondency will flee from a heart which is thus settled in the will of God.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers

TRUE to his purpose of narrating the events in the life of Christ, which had impressed the disciples with a belief in the divinity of his person and mission, John describes this miracle at Cana, which evidently had a profound effect on their minds. It revealed Christ as one who controlled nature, and as one who sympathized with the needs and pleasures of ordinary life. To the men who had been with John the Baptist, Christ's conduct in going to the wedding would be a surprise. Still more astonished would they be when they saw him miraculously contribute to the enjoyment of the company. It is a surprise to us when we think of the experience of the previous six weeks. Christ had been in the wilderness contending with temptation. A fierce and bitter conflict was only just ended, and, as he returned to society, we would expect him to preach and begin his mission with some striking manifestation of power. Instead, we find him one of a group of guests at an ordinary wedding, and the first exercise of superhuman power is the increase of the resources of his hosts. It suggests the nearness and brotherliness of Christ, and perhaps he may have had that in mind when he began his ministry in this social way. It is worthy of notice, too, that his sympathy should have been shown in that particular way. He had refused to turn stones into bread to satisfy his own hunger, but he turns water to wine to save the wedded pair from mortification. What he would not do for himself, he would do for others, and the same principle governed all his life. Various attempts have been made to explain away the miracle, but they are not worth consideration. The narrative, evidently that of an eye-witness, shows that the change was miraculous, and that its completeness was proved by the remark of the man who presided, and who did not know how the wine had been produced. The question will arise whether the wine was intoxicating. Though there is no proof, one way or the other, we may infer from the fact that unfermented [illegible] would have appealed to Jesus in the difficulty [illegible] was the beginning of miracles, implies that Mary had never seen him work a miracle; yet she evidently thought that he would remove the difficulty. Perhaps it was the coming of Jesus and his five disciples which had caused it, and Mary's words may have been intended to remind him of the fact. She did not, however, ask him to do anything; but was content to tell him of the need. Her example is worth following. In our prayers we sometimes ask for a specific interference, when it would be wiser to state our case and leave God to take his own way of dealing with it. The story is told of a man who needed a sum of money to pay off a mortgage. There was another man in the same town who could lend it to him, and he went to his minister and asked him to join with him in prayer that God would influence this man's mind to lend it. The minister said, "No, let us tell God of the need, and leave him to find the way of satisfying it." But that would not content the would-be borrower, and he urged his petition in his own way. But his application was rejected, and he mourned that his prayer was unanswered. Yet it was not unanswered. An old debt that he had long regarded as hopelessly bad was unexpectedly paid, and he had then no occasion to borrow, as he had sufficient funds of his own to pay the mortgage.

Woman, what have I to do with thee? This expression was not so harsh as it appears in translation. "Woman," as Christ used the word, was a term of respect, such as would be used by a comparative stranger. It was like the word "Lady," that a car-conductor will use now in speaking to a passenger. It was, however, a reproof, as is indicated by the question. Jesus, apparently, meant Mary to understand that her maternal authority, which he had recognized for so many years, did not apply to his mission. It was for him to decide in what way he would manifest his power. The time still comes in some lives, when a man must refuse the request of one whom he tenderly loves, in order to obey his conscience. There is a famous picture of a Huguenot, a tall, handsome young man, who is looking lovingly, but firmly into the eyes of a beautiful girl, as she tries to tie a scarf around his arm. It tells its own story. On the eve of St. Bartholomew's day all the Huguenots in Paris were to be massacred. The Catholics had planned that not a Protestant should be left alive. The token that ensured safety was a scarf bound around the left arm. The girl knew it, and wanted to fasten one on the arm of her lover, but it would practically be a declaration that he was a Catholic, and he would not wear it. In his face are signs of the struggle between conscience and love, a struggle that many a man since his time has known.

Whatsoever he saith unto you, do it. Mary evidently thought in spite of Christ's answer, that he would in some way interpose. Her charge to the servants was one that might be given to every one of his followers now. It may have seemed a foolish thing to the servants to fill the water-pots with water, and then draw it out and carry it to a man who did not want water, but wine. They did it, however, and the result justified their obedience. The story is told of a switchman on a railroad who was horrified to see his dearly loved child standing on the track in the way of an approaching express train. If he could leave the switch he could snatch her from danger, but that would involve catastrophe for the train, and he dare not do it, even to save that precious child's life. He called to her to lie down. She threw herself prostrate instantly, and the train passed harmlessly over her. But what if the child had hesitated? Or had doubted the wisdom of her father's order? Prompt, unquestioning obedience saved her, and it is this kind of obedience that God expects of us.

SOBBED WITH JOY OVER A PARDON

A Remarkable Scene During Mr. Moody's Visit to the Colorado State Prison — Convicts Cheering and Weeping After a Thanksgiving Sermon

DURING Mr. D. L. Moody's visit to Colorado, he addressed a large number of gatherings under Y. M. C. A. and other auspices. While all were notably successful, in a spiritual sense, there was one gathering, the memory of which will remain with the evangelist as long as life lasts.

D. L. MOODY

For many years past Mr. Moody has never missed an opportunity to carry the Gospel to those in prison. He believes that within the walls of our penal institutions, there is one of the best fields for Gospel effort that can be found in the whole world. Accordingly, when the invitation came to visit the convicts in the State Prison at Canon City, Col., it was cordially accepted.

On November 24, the great evangelist stepped on the platform in the prison chapel, and was introduced to his waiting audience by Mr. Burns, the prison chaplain. Hundreds of eager-faced men and women sat before him, and upon every countenance there was a mingled expression of interest and anxiety. Many of them had heard of the evangelist—some possibly had listened to him in other gatherings—but in his coming thousands of miles to deliver the Gospel message to them, at that Thanksgiving season, there was something so unusual that all felt specially drawn to the earnest, cheery-voiced speaker.

A Strange Audience

It was, indeed, a gathering that needed just such a message as he had to bring. Age and youth were there; gray-haired criminals, and novices serving their first term; men and women with hard-seamed visages, and some from whose faces the soft lines had not yet faded and who, but for the look of settled care, might have seemed even attractive. But as soon as Mr. Moody began to speak, after the prison-choir had finished the opening hymn, and the last notes of the organ had died away, the entire audience became alive with interest.

The evangelist took for his subject, "Regeneration." At the close of his address, he announced that he was the bearer of an important communication from Hon. Alva Adams, Governor of the State of Colorado, which he would now present to his hearers, together with the usual Thanksgiving pardon. His words seemed to act electrically upon the prisoners. Necks were craned toward the platform, as Mr. Moody took from his pocket and slowly unfolded the documents which all wished to hear.

It seemed at that moment as though every man and woman in the prison chapel had a secret hope that, through some extraordinary piece of good fortune, he or she should receive freedom through the gubernatorial clemency.

In slow and measured tones, each syllable dropping from his lips with clear distinctness, Mr. Moody read this letter:

STATE OF COLORADO, }
EXECUTIVE CHAMBER, DENVER, NOV. 23, '98. }

My Dear Mr. Moody:

At your prison service to-morrow, will you—if the warden has no objections—present the Thanksgiving pardon, which Secretary Stonaker will deliver?

Mr. Stonaker will give the particulars of the case, and the motives that induce me to give freedom to this poor woman. That this day of Thanksgiving may be to her the birthday of a new, clean, honest life is my prayer.

Very truly,
(Signed) ALVA ADAMS.

Silence prevailed so intense as to be painful. Men and women scanned each other's faces, as though they might read the secret so well kept; for up to that moment none save the evangelist, Warden Cleghorn and Matron Jordan knew the name of the prisoner for whom Governor Adams had reserved this precious boon.

Mr. Moody then unrolled the pardon and began to read it. When the name of Mrs. Susan J. Emerson was announced as that of the fortunate one to be liberated, there was a sudden outburst of enthusiasm from the convict audience that shook the building. This applause, so emphatic and general, told more than any words could do how gratified the prisoners felt at the choice the Governor had made.

At the first mention of her name, the woman had sprung to her feet, and even when the demonstration had subsided, she stood there, flushed and blinded with the fulness of her new-found happiness. Her body swayed from side to side, and she seemed to fall, when, suddenly she moved forward and sank to her knees, her hands outstretched to the warden and matron on either side. There she remained for an instant, her head bowed to the floor, her slender body shaken with convulsive sobs, as she vainly attempted, in broken and incoherent exclamations, to give voice to her gratitude. But the few words that could be heard went right to the hearts of all; they understood, and their overflowing sympathy found expression in another demonstration, similar to the first, during which the poor face, upon which smiles and tears fought together for the mastery, was again raised for an instant, only to be sunk, sobbing afresh, upon the matron's lap.

"WHILE THE CONVICTS APPLAUDED . . . SHE SANK ON HER KNEES, SOBBING"

Prisoners in Tears

There were few dry eyes at that moment in the prison chapel, and Mr. Moody, accustomed as he is to scenes of emotion, found it difficult to control his feelings. Unwonted tears were trickling down many hard-lined faces in the audience, and many a furtive sleeve wiped the tears away.

The pardoned woman was led to a seat, but her emotions were so deeply stirred that she had no power to speak, and sat quietly, sobbing and rocking herself to and fro, her eyes bent on the floor. It was an occasion which none who were present will ever forget, and was a most fitting conclusion to the sermon that had been preached by the great evangelist.

Terse and pointed were Mr. Moody's remarks that day. The following extracts from his sermon show how, with homely illustration and epigrammatic force, he made the unregenerate people in his audience understand what they needed and what was their only hope:

"I was twenty years old before I ever heard a sermon on regeneration. I was told to be good, but you might as well tell a black man to be a white man, as to tell him to be good without telling him how. You might tell a slave to be free, but that would not make him free, if you didn't help him. Christ not only tells us to be free, but he frees us. In the third chapter of Genesis we read how man lost life. In the third chapter of John we find how he gets it back again.

"We are a bad lot by nature. It is astonishing how the devil does blind us and make us think we are so naturally good.

"Suppose that your sins could all be stamped on your forehead, do you not think there would be a stampede? Take the best man there is here, the natural man that never has been born from above, never has been born of the Spirit, and suppose that everything in his heart could be brought to light. Suppose a photographer could take a photograph of the heart, do you think they would find any one who would be willing to have such a photograph taken? Ladies crimp their hair and put on their best clothes, and men dress up and go to the barber's to get shaved, and they go and have their pictures taken; and if the photographer flatters us and makes us look ten years younger, we say, 'You are the first man to do me justice,' and we take ten dozen and send them to all our friends. That isn't a real photograph. Suppose he took a photograph of your heart, would you send those around? Not much; you would break the plate and abuse the photographer. Don't talk to me about people being naturally good and angelic.

God's Image Effaced

"We are naturally bad, the whole crowd of us. The first man born of woman was a murderer. Sin leaped into the world full blown, and the whole race has been bad all the way down. Man is naturally bad.

"Man has lost the image of God. Take just one picture that Christ gives of the human heart: "Out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies; these are the things which defile the man." Now I want to ask you how in the world can you get a pure stream when you have such an impure fountain? The trouble with people is that they are trying to make that stream good while the fountain is bad. It isn't patching up the old man that is needed, but it is hewing down that tree and putting a new graft in. It is an entire change, a new creation. I have heard of reform, reform, until I am tired and sick of the whole thing. It is regeneration by the power of the Holy Ghost that we need. It isn't this trying to make men believe that they have just come a little short of the glory of God, and if they just apply a little whitewash on the outside, they will be all right. You may whitewash a pest house, but it will be a pest house still. I heard an Englishman tell of a man who bought a farm. There was a well on that farm, and they told him there was poison in the well. He said, 'All right, I will fix it,' and went and painted the pump, thinking he was going to make the well all right by painting the pump. There are a lot of people who think they are going to make the well all right by painting the pump. What you want is to go to the source. Make the fountain good, and the stream will be good. Let the heart be right, and the life will be right, the hand will be right, the foot will be right. The seat of trouble is the heart, and what man needs is a new heart, a new creation.

The Swan and the Crane

"In India the swan is considered a sacred bird, but they have a legend there that one day an old crane was out on the beach looking for snails, and down came a big white swan. The crane stretched out its great long neck and said to the swan:

"'Where do you come from?'

"The swan said he came from heaven.

"'Heaven,' said the crane, 'I never heard of that place. Is it far away?'

"'Oh, yes.'

"'Is it a good country?'

"'Oh, yes.'

"'Is it better than this?'

"'Oh, far better;' and the swan went on expatiating about heaven, about its lakes and its rivers and its fountains and its climate. The old crane stood there listening, and when the swan got through, said:

"'Have they any snails there?'

"The swan drew itself up and said, 'No, vile things! They wouldn't have them in heaven.'

"'Well, then,' said the crane, 'you can have your heaven: I don't want it. I want snails.'

"Don't you see a mighty truth wrapped up in that legend? I have had mothers come to me and say, 'Mr. Moody, isn't it strange that my boy doesn't like spiritual things? Isn't it strange that he would rather have low earthly things than spiritual things?' Strange? No! the natural man likes natural things, of course. The worldly man likes worldly things. Why shouldn't he? And the spiritual man likes spiritual things. Did you ever see a young man that has a beautiful mother, a lovely home, a godly father, and loving brother and sisters, and the home a little paradise on earth; and he will turn his back on that home and go to Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, and get into what you call the slums, and he will go down, down, until he gets to a miserable old saloon where he is willing to clean out spittoons for drink. Tell him his mother wants him, is praying for him, and will give him a warm welcome, and tell him how his father will receive him, tell him there is going to be rejoicing in his home if he will come back, and tell him how his brothers and sisters long to have him come back, and he will turn and say,

"'No, I want whiskey.'

The Old Nature

"He has the old nature. He wants snails.

"Tell him that he is going to lose his soul, tell him he is making shipwreck of his life, in fact he has made shipwreck of his life, and tell him about the glories of heaven, and he will say,

"'You can have heaven with all its glory. You may have my mother; I will crush her under my heel. I despise Christianity.'

"He has the old carnal nature. But if he gets God's nature, he gets out from those surroundings pretty quick. You can't keep him there. What men want is to be born from above, born again, born of the Spirit. And then they will live for heaven; and you will never get a man or woman to live for heaven until they are born from above, until they get the divine life."

Freshen Up!

HOW to get out of the old rut without twisting off the wheel, or snapping the shafts, or breaking the horse's leg, is a question not more appropriate to every teamster than to every Christian worker. Having once got out of the old rut, the next thing is to keep out of it. There is nothing more killing than ecclesiastical humdrum. Some persons do not like the Episcopal Church because they have the same prayers every Sabbath, but have we not for the last ten years been hearing the same prayers over and over again, the product of a self-manufactured liturgy that has not the thousandth part of the excellency of those petitions that we hear in the Episcopal Church? In many of our churches sinners hear the same exhortations they have been hearing for the last fifteen years, so that the impenitent man knows, the moment the exhorter clears his throat, just what is going to be said; and the hearer himself is able to recite the exhortation, as we teach our children the multiplication table forward or backward. We could not understand the doleful strain of a certain brother's prayer, till we found out that he composed it on a fast day during the yellow fever in 1821, and has been using it ever since. There are laymen who do not like to hear a sermon preached the second time, who yet give their pastors the same prayer every week at the devotional meeting, that is, fifty two times in the year, with occasional slices of it between meals. If they made any spiritual advancement they would have new wants to express and new thanksgivings to offer. But they have been for a decade of years stuck fast in the mud, and they splash the same thing on you every week. We need a universal church cleaning, by which all canting and humdrum shall be scrubbed out.

If we would keep fresh, let us make occasional excursions into other circles than our own. Artists generally go with artists, farmers with farmers, mechanics with mechanics, clergymen with clergymen, Christian workers with Christian workers. But there is nothing that sooner freshens one up than to get in a new group, mingling with people whose thought and work run in different channels. For a change, put the minister on the hayrack, and the farmer in the clergyman's study.

Let us go much into the presence of the natural world if we can get at it. Especially if we live in great thoroughfares, let us make occasional flight to the woods and the mountains. Even the trees in town seem artificial. They dare not speak where there are so many to listen, and the hyacinth and geranium in flower-pots in the window seem to know they are on exhibition. If we would once in a while romp the fields, we would not have so many last year's rose-leaves in our sermons, but those just plucked dewy and redolent. We cannot see the natural world through the books or the eyes of others. All the talk about "babbling brooks" is a stereotyped humbug. Brooks never "babble." To babble is to be unintelligent and imperfect of tongue. But when the brooks speak, they utter lessons of beauty that the dullest ear can understand. We have wandered from the Androscoggin, in Maine, to the Tombigbee, in Alabama, and we never found a brook that "babbled." The people babble who talk about them, not knowing what a brook is. We have heard about the nightingale and the morning lark till we are tired of them. Catch for your next prayer-meeting talk a chewink or a brown thresher. It is high time that we hoist our church-windows, especially those over the pulpit, and let in some fresh air from the fields and mountains.

A Slandered World

THERE has been a great deal of wholesale slander of this world. People abuse it, and the traveler on the mountain curses the chill, and the voyager on the deep curses the restlessness, and there are those who say it is a mean, old, despicable world, and from pole to pole it has been calumniated, and if the world should present a libel suit for all those who have slandered it, there would not be gold enough in the mountains to pay the damages, or places enough in the penitentiaries to hold the offenders.

The people not only slander the world, but they slander its neighbors, and they belabor the sun, now because it is too ardent, and now because it is too distant; but by experience I have found out, when there is anything wrong, the trouble is not with the sun, or the moon, or the stars, or the meteorological conditions; the trouble is with myself. Judging from the reports that come from the astronomical observatories, I believe that in all the universe, excepting heaven, this is the most comfortable and convenient world. Some of these other worlds are all water, others are all rock, others are all fire. Some are swept with electric cyclones and others are upheaved by volcanoes that toss whole continents into the air at one jerk. And if Dr. Chalmers was right in his theory that other worlds are inhabited, I am sorry for them. I wish all these agonizing climates might have an elysium, and that the unfortunate inhabitants might have genial skies like those which bless us, and as blushing a sunset, and as glorious a morning in which the archangel of sublimity and pomp spreads his pinions over cloud and mountain and sea, incubating a new day! Before God launched this ship of a world from the dockyards of eternity he so splendidly fitted it up—the cabins, the masts, the wheelhouses, the decks—that though the world has been beating on the rocks for many years because of man's poor pilotage, it is magnificent still, and good men are trying to get the ship off the rocks, and before long the wreckers with the pulleys and tugs will have completed their work, and through all the earth and all the heavens will be heard the cry: "She floats, she floats!"

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

THE PEACE OF THE WORLD

DURING the closing weeks of the year 1898, a tremendous impetus has been given to the movement for International Peace. The proposals issued by the Czar of Russia for a Peace Conference at which all the important governments on the globe should be represented, have been discussed in all the European Cabinets as well as in our own.

One of the most earnest advocates of the International Peace movement is Mr. W. T. Stead, of London. He writes:

I have seen the Czar. I have heard from his own lips the earnest desire of his heart that something practical should be done, and that quickly, to divert to the service of humanity some of the many millions now devoted to preparation for war. He has taken the initiative in summoning the Conference. He is pledged to give earnest of his sincerity by proposing the limitation of European armaments. But unless he is supported by those who detest militarism as well as by those who groan under its burdens, his well-meant endeavor will fail.

The American people can, if they will, prevent [illegible]. At the present moment [illegible] the whole powers [illegible] position of the question [illegible] of the governments. But to do this it will be necessary to act, and act at once.

These Russian proposals, stated briefly, are: (1) That there should be declared a truce of God for five years; (2) that during that period the governments should not increase their expenditure on armaments beyond the figure stated by them at the conference as the maximum of their needs; (3) that some international [illegible] arise between the signatories of this pact, bind them always to invite the mediation of neutral powers before appealing to the sword.

No more glorious crusade was ever begun, in the name of Christianity, than this, which has for its object the pacification of the whole earth. And if all Christians in civilized lands unite, the governments cannot resist the influence that will be brought to bear upon them and will fall into line for "peace on earth and good will to men."

With a pact of peace, embracing the great nations; with an international patrol on the seas in the interests of peace, and with an international tribunal before which all causes of quarrel should be compulsorily brought for adjudication, the clash of arms, the useless shedding of blood, and the needless destruction of human life would be wholly averted. It has been well said that war settles nothing, that the morality or justice of a cause cannot be decided by a resort to arms. And what, in our age of advanced Christianity, can be said by those who are the provokers and inciters to war?

"I have never made anybody happy—not myself, nor my family, nor anybody else." Prince Bismarck is reported to have said during his last illness. "But how many have I made unhappy! But for me three great wars would not have been fought, eighty thousand men would not have perished. Parents, brothers, sisters and widows, would not be bereaved and plunged into mourning . . . I have had little or no joy from all my achievements; nothing but vexation, care and trouble."

Putting the past behind us forever, let the Christian people of the United States now come to the front, as the advocates of international peace, as the supporters of a world-wide "truce of God," to which all the great nations shall be signatories. Our seventy millions of population should speak with a voice so loud and emphatic that the whole world will hear and understand.

The first step is for every adult reader of this journal to use his or her personal influence in aid of this beneficent cause, by addressing our National Executive, urging action to secure the much-desired object. If every godly man and woman in America were to write a letter to President McKinley—a brief, courteous, earnest appeal in behalf of national co-operation for universal peace—the attitude of our government would be determined speedily, and, as Mr. Stead has declared, this country would prevent a catastrophe. Since the Almighty has made of us a powerful nation, it is our sacred duty to employ that power for the spiritual and material welfare of humanity. That power cannot be better utilized than in the interests of universal peace.

It has been suggested that in addressing the Executive the following form may be adopted:

To His Excellency, the President of the U. S.

Sir: It is respectfully urged at this time of [illegible] and [illegible] that the United States [illegible] through the proper channels, accord the fullest co-operation to the movement [illegible] for International Peace [illegible] by the Czar [illegible] the European Governments. Our State Department and Congress should take such action as may be necessary to put this nation on record as favoring:

1. An International Truce between the great nations, for a period of years.
2. The creation of an International Court of Arbitration, to which all disputes arising between nations during the [illegible] of the truce, may be submitted, instead of appealing to the arbitrament of war.
3. The creation of an International Ocean Peace Patrol for the preservation of peace on the seas and the protection of commerce.

These [illegible] be [illegible] by the progressive spirit of the Christian age. The time is ripe for good men everywhere to speak and act for universal peace and for the brotherhood of the human family. To this end, we should extend our heartiest co-operation to [illegible] proposals and thereby [illegible] tian nation, in the solution of problems that affect the future welfare of the entire race.

It is well worth while for all to work and pray for such a glorious consummation—the peace of the world!

The Church Missionary Society has received [illegible]

The Baptist Missionary Board makes an appeal [illegible] Cuba.

The Salvation Army has already begun work in Manila, the capital of the Philippines. [illegible] filled nightly by English-speaking people.

The women of Massachusetts are preparing to grapple with the curse of the "sweat-shops." [illegible] will be attached to garments made under proper sanitary conditions.

One step in the direction of temperance has been taken in France. A company having four hundred restaurants in various districts in Paris has announced that the use of spirits of all kinds is now prohibited in all its establishments.

The Christian Endeavor Society of the City Temple of London, of which Dr. Joseph Parker is pastor, has established a home of rest in a salubrious neighborhood near the sea, for the benefit of ministers and others needing recuperation.

According to a recent census in India, there were nearly a half million married children under nine years of age, and over 250,000 widowed children under fifteen years of age, doomed by the customs of the country to the ignominy of a life-long widowhood.

News comes of famine in Persia. Dr. Shedd says that already wheat is in some districts three, four and even five times the normal price, and instances have occurred of girls being sold as slaves to save their parents and brothers from starving to death.

The latest reports concerning the Anglican Church in Hawaii, which may be transferred to the American Episcopal Church, show that there are on the islands seven clergymen, seven churches, and a membership of 1,500, of whom fifteen are Hawaiians.

Invitations have already been issued to the various national and international temperance societies to make arrangements for a world's temperance convention to be held in London in the year 1900. They are signed by the Archbishop of Canterbury. The last time such a convention was held there was in 1846.

The Board of Foreign Missions of the Dutch Reformed Church has made the appropriations for the year 1899. The Missions in their estimates, ask for $123,119. The Board appropriated for the Missions and their work during the coming year, $92,381. This is a reduction of $30,743, or almost exactly twenty-five per cent.

The Reports of the Protestant Episcopal Church show that during the past year sixty-two dioceses and missionary jurisdictions had an increase of 22,259 communicants, and thirteen dioceses and missionary jurisdictions had a decrease of 1,850 communicants, being a net increase of 20,409 communicants during the year.

At a recent meeting of the Salvation Army, Commissioner Booth-Tucker made an earnest appeal for money to carry on the Army's work. A plainly-dressed lady in the audience responded by passing up a slip of paper, on which was written a promise to give realty valued at $20,000. She desired the gift to be anonymous, but it is found that her name is Mrs. Fuller, a widow of Bayonne, N. J.

A testimony to the benefit of Sunday observance comes from an unexpected quarter. Mr. F. F. Mackay, President of the Actors' Society of America, has issued an appeal to the ministers of New York, asking their aid in discouraging Sunday performances in the theatres. He says that the actors have for several years protested against the Sunday performances, which they regard as a radical wrong.

THE LAFAYETTE MEMORIAL

THE project of presenting to the French people an imposing memorial of Lafayette by the people of the United States has evoked an appreciative response in Paris. A large space in the garden of the Louvre has been set apart for it, and will be called Lafayette Square. The site is a most appropriate one for a memorial or a statue of heroic proportions, and had already been selected for the purpose under the Second Empire. Napoleon III. arranged to erect upon it a statue of his illustrious uncle, Napoleon I. This is proof that the French Government has appropriated to the projected tribute one of the finest sites at its disposal. This cordial response will give an impetus to the work of raising the fund for defraying the cost of the memorial. Mr. George Peck, United States Commissioner to the Paris Exposition, who originated the project of erecting a memorial to Lafayette, in Paris, is anxious that the fund for the purpose should be raised by the children in the public schools. No child graduates from our schools without full knowledge of the services the distinguished French Marquis rendered to our fathers in the critical time when they were struggling for the liberty that they bequeathed to us. They know that the enthusiastic Frenchman risked his life in the cause of the young nation and made its interests his own both in the battle-field and in the French Court. More than a century has passed away since those services were rendered, but the glorious story of the Revolution is rightly told, and will be told to every generation, and it cannot be told without its mead of praise to the valorous French nobleman who did all that it was in his power to do to bring it to success. By the courtesy of the New York Herald, we are able to give a picture of the memorial it is proposed to raise in his honor in the country of his birth, as a tribute from young Americans. If, as we hope, the project is successful, it will show that the children appreciate the liberty they enjoy, and are grateful to the man who aided in securing it. We may hope, too, that they will remember that the true freedom they may attain was won for them by One to whom their life-long gratitude is due, and that they may show it by making their lives a memorial of Him:

If ye continue in my word then are ye my disciples indeed; and ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free (John 8: 31).

To Regulate a New Territory

The bill to provide a government for the new Territory of Hawaii has been introduced in the United States Senate, and favorably reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations. It was originally prepared by the Hawaiian Commission, but it has been amended in several important points at the suggestion of the Committee, and it will in all probability pass in its present form. It provides for the election of a Territorial Legislature of Assembly and Senate having powers similar to the Legislatures of existing Territories. The only modifications are such as will prevent the change being too abrupt from the customs in vogue under the present government. It is provided that no person shall be eligible for election to the Senate who does not possess property worth $1,000, and the same qualification is required to entitle a citizen to vote for a Senator. There is no property qualification for a member of the lower house. All the persons who were citizens of Hawaii on August 13, 1898, become, under the bill, citizens of the United States. This provision will be very gratifying to the Hawaiian people, and they will change their allegiance joyfully. It is much to be wished that there was similar alacrity in the people to whom citizenship in the kingdom of God is offered, but many fail to avail themselves of the offer though the privileges it confers are infinite.

They who shall be accounted worthy to obtain that world . . . . are equal unto the angels and are the children of God (Luke 20: 35, 36).

A Miniature Sun

One of the most notable results, says a scientific journal, arrived at by experimenters who have dissected the electric arc light, is the fact that practically all the energy of the light, either in the form of light, heat, or anything else, radiates from a small dot, which is invariably found in a pit on the end of the carbon, called the "crater;" the radiant energy of this dot has been measured, and found to have a curious correspondence with the compound radiant energy of the sun's surface, viz., at the rate of 100,000 horse power to the square meter. Observation shows that there is always a definite ratio between the energy of any body and its temperature, so that if the radiant energy of two bodies is the same, so is their temperature—that of the radiant dot of the electric arc is nearly 6,500 degrees Fahrenheit, hence the probability of the sun's surface being the same, in view of the correspondence in measure of energy. It is so in the spiritual world. The disparity between God and man is infinitely greater than that between the sun and the little crater of the electric arc, but we are assured that when God kindles his light in a man's soul his own nature is imparted in such measure as humanity can contain it.

THE PROPOSED MEMORIAL TO LAFAYETTE IN PARIS

The spirit of man is the candle of the Lord (Prov. 20: 27).

Adopting a Chinese Child

The Supreme Court has been called upon to decide a dispute as to the custody of a child of Chinese parents. Some time ago, a lady who does mission work in the Chinese quarters of New York, noticed a child whose parents neglected her and seemed to consider her a burden. The missionary found a friend who would adopt her, and would give her a home and Christian education. An adoption paper was drawn up which the mother signed, and the child was transferred to her new protectress. After some months, however, the mother claimed the child, and being refused, appealed to the court. The judge decided that she should remain with the lady who had adopted her. He said: "As the well-being of the child is the main question to be considered in cases of this character, I am unwilling to send the little girl back to parents who are opium smokers and dealers in opium, and who have heretofore neglected the child." The judge's decision was wise, but how many parents would now be mourning the loss of their children, if God dealt so with them! There are few who deserve the encomium pronounced on the patriarch:

I know him that he will command his children and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord (Gen. 18: 19).

A Wedding Above the Clouds

A singular scene for a wedding was chosen recently by a Canadian bride. She proposed that the marriage be solemnized on the top of Mount Sullivan, the highest mountain in Kootenay, where her prospective husband lived. With the deference which bridegrooms pay to the wishes of their brides, the young man consented. A few days ago, the wedding party clad in furs, climbed the mountain, and shortly before noon stood on the top, eight thousand feet above the level of the sea. Above and around them the day was bright and clear, but below them dense clouds shut out the view. It is sometimes difficult to believe when the storms of trouble come upon us that there is any brightness or peace anywhere. If in after-life this couple should have such an experience, the recollection of their marriage day may suggest the thought that there is a refuge in the skies, for those who seek it, where all storms and trials are left behind.

In thy presence is fulness of joy; at thy right hand there are pleasures forever more (Ps. 16: 11).

Deserted by Sleep

Wisconsin journals, reporting the death of a successful business man of that section, mention a strange experience in connection with him. During the time that he was building up his business and accumulating a fortune that at his death amounted to several millions, he was indefatigable in his devotion to work. He was not satisfied to leave the supervision of any department of his factory to a subordinate, but superintended the work of every room. This involved him in conducting his correspondence, etc., after the factory was closed for the night, and he frequently stayed in his office working at his books until four or five o'clock in the morning. A few years ago he retired from business. Then he made the discovery that the power to sleep had deserted him. He had practically no cares and no troubles, but he could not sleep. All his efforts seemed to be directed to finding some means of wooing slumber, but seldom succeeding. His physical nature was exacting a terrible penalty for his long neglect of its laws. It denied him the blessing which he had formerly rejected. It is so with God's spiritual blessings. When a man deliberately rejects them that he may enjoy the pleasures of sin, he frequently has to seek them in vain when sin has lost its charm.

They would none of my counsel; they despised all my reproof. Therefore shall they eat of the fruit of their own way and be filled with their own devices (Prov. 1: 30).

Surprised Wedding Guests

At a recent wedding in the town of Derry, Conn., there was a singular surprise in store for all the parties present, principals and guests included. The only person who did not share this general feeling was the aged father of the bride, a millionaire manufacturer, whose daughter, a lovely, dark-haired girl, was about to be united to a young business man belonging to a neighboring town. After the ceremony at the church, and when the gay party had assembled at the bride's paternal home, the father handed his daughter a check for $250,000, and presented one for $150,000 to the young bridegroom. In addition, he gave the newly-wedded pair a third check for $50,000, which he desired them to spend exclusively upon the wedding trip, as he wished them to take an extended tour to Cuba and Europe, and make the honeymoon one to be pleasantly remembered all their lives. There were many other wedding presents from wealthy friends, some of the gifts being choice and costly, but the unexampled munificence of the father cast all else into shadow. He has probably achieved the distinction of having given the costliest wedding present ever recorded in this country; yet it is by no means certain that it was the wisest. The possession of wealth sufficient to assure independence at the very outset of a career may have a tendency to discourage effort and retard the development of talents and qualities which, under other circumstances, might have found their fruition in true nobility of character. The young people are, however, well equipped for the duties of charity and helpfulness. In that sphere they will find abundant opportunities for their energy and their wealth, and need have no fear of the evils coming on them which, according to the prophet, befell people in his time similarly situated:

Pride, fulness of bread and abundance of idleness were in her and in her daughters, neither did she strengthen the hand of the poor and needy (Ezek. 16: 49).

"A BEAUTIFUL POSSIBILITY"

A New and Charming Serial Story, Written Exclusively for "The Christian Herald"

BY EDITH FERGUSON BLACK

SUMMARY OF THE STORY

In Barbadoes, Lenox Hildreth, a New England gentleman of learning, culture and wealth, was living with his only daughter, Evadne, a beautiful girl, who, at the opening of the story is sixteen years of age. Mr. Hildreth, though charitable and kind, was an infidel, but in his later years turned in faith and love to Christ. He intended telling his daughter of the change, but a sudden seizure of illness found him with the disclosure not made. With his dying breath he enjoined her to make it the business of her life to seek Christ. The girl, whom he had reared a pagan, could not understand his injunction. After his death, she removes to the home of her uncle, Judge Hildreth, at Marlborough, in New England, to whom, as his only brother, Lenox Hildreth confided her and her large fortune. On her way, intent on obeying her father, she asks a fellow-passenger, a bishop's wife, how she can find Christ; but the lady thinks her irreverent, and does not satisfy her. Arriving at Marlborough, she receives a formal welcome from her uncle's wife and daughters. On a farm in the neighborhood of Marlborough, John Randolph, a young man, is trying to shape his life on the principles of Christ's teaching.

CHAPTER VI.

Light From the Stable.

EVADNE found herself one morning in Judge Hildreth's roomy coach house, watching Pompey as he skilfully groomed her uncle's pets.

It had been decided that after the summer holidays, she should become a member of the fashionable school which Isabelle and Marion attended—in the meantime she was left almost entirely to her own devices. Her uncle was away all day, Louis at college, and her aunt busy with social duties. Her cousins had their own particular friends, who were not slow to vote the silent girl with the mournful gray eyes, full of a dumb questioning, a bore; while Evadne, accustomed to being her father's companion, listening to his sprightly conversation and sharing in all his scientific researches, found their vapid chatter wearisome.

Horses she had been accustomed to from her early childhood and she loved them. She noted with pleased interest Pompey's deft manipulations. She stood for a long time in silence. Pompey had saluted her respectfully and then kept on steadily with his work. Dexterously he swept the curry-comb over the shining coats, and then drew it through the brush in his left hand with a curious sibilant vocal accompaniment, something between a long-drawn whistle and a sigh, and the horses laid their heads against his shoulder affectionately and looked curiously at the stranger out of their large bright eyes.

"Did you really know my father?" she asked at length.

"Laws yes, Missy!" and Pompey's honest black face grew tender with sympathy. "Mass Lennux stayed with the Judge 'fore he went to Barbadoes, and he spent powerful sight of his time out here wid me and de horses. He wus alwers del'cut—warn't able to do nothin' in this yere climate, but he hed sech a sperit!—he wouldn't ever let folks know when he wuz a sufferin'. He use ter call me Pompous," and Pompey chuckled softly. "He say when I git inter my fur coat I look as gran' on de box as de Jedge do inside; an' one day he braided de horses' manes inter a hundred tails and tied 'em wid yeller ribbun, 'cause he said de crimps wuz in de fashion, and yeller wuz de Jedge's 'lecshun color. De Jedge wuz powerful angry. He don't like sech tricks wid his horses. But laws! he couldn't keep angry wid Mass Lennux! He jest stood wid his han's on his sides, an' larf an' larf, till the Jedge he hev to larf, too, an' he calls him a graceless scamp an' he say he send him ter Coventry; an' Mass Lennux he say all right, ef de Jedge he go 'long too, and take de horses—he couldn't do widout dem, no how."

"Were these the horses my father used to ride?"

"Laws no, Missy. Dey wuz as black as night. Mass Lennux use ter call 'em Egyp' and Erybus."

Pompey's face softened.

"When my little gal died, he jes' put his han' on my shoulder, an' sez he, 'Pompous, you jes' go home and cheer up de missus, yer don't hev no call ter worry 'bout de horses.' An' he took care of 'em jes' as ef he'd been a coachman. We'll never fergit it, Dyce an' me."

Evadne's eyes shone. That was just like her father!

"'Specs little Miss is powerful lonesum 'thout Mass Lennux?"

The soft voice was full of genuine regret. Evadne sank down on a bench which stood beside her and burst into tears.

"Oh, Pompey, I wish I could die!"

"'Specs little Miss hez no call ter wish dat," said Pompey gently, "'specs de Lord Jesus wants her ter live fer him."

Evadne opened her eyes in wonder.

"The Lord Jesus!" she repeated. "Why, Pompey, do you know him?"

A great joy transfigured the black face.

"He is my frien'!" he said simply.

Evadne leaned forward eagerly.

"Oh, Pompey, if that is true, then you can help me find him!"

Pompey smiled joyously.

"Miss 'Vadny don't need to go far away for dat. He is right here."

"Here!" echoed Evadne faintly.

"'Lo, I am wid you all de days,'" Pompey repeated softly. "De Lord Jesus don't leave no gaps in his promises, Miss 'Vadny. He's alwers wid me wherever I is workin', and when I is up on my box a drivin' troo de streets, he's dere. He's wid me continuous. Dere's nuthin' can seprate Pompey from de Lord," he added with a sweet reverence.

"How can you be so sure," she asked wistfully.

"I hez his word, Missy. I believe him like I specs you alwers believed your father. He says: 'I will not leave you orphuns, I will cum ter you.' I specs dat verse is meant speshully fer you, Miss Vadny."

"But we can't see him," said Evadne.

"Only wid de eye of faith, Missy. We trusts our friens in de dark. You didn't need ter see your father ter know he wuz in de house?"

"Oh, no!" Evadne's voice trembled.

"It's jest de same wid my Father, Miss Vadny."

"How can you call God so, Pompey?"

A great sweetness came over the homely face.

"'Cause he hez sent his sperit inter my heart, an' poor black Pompey kin look up inter de shinin of his face an' say, my Father, 'cause I'se hidden away in his Son. I'se a little branch abidin in de great Vine. I'se one wid de Lord Jesus."

"I don't know where to look for him," Evadne cried disconsolately.

Pompey laid aside his curry-comb and brush and folded his toil-worn hands. "Lord Jesus," he said quietly, "here is thy little lamb. She's out in de dark mountain, an' she's lonesum and hungry an de col' rain of sorrow is beatin upon her head. Lord, thou is de good Shepherd. Let her hear thy voice a callin her. Carry this little lamb in thy bosom and give her de joy of thy love."

This was the first of many conversations with Pompey, whose simple faith and warm affection touched Evadne deeply. Above the coach-house was a large room, where Pompey kept a store of hay and grain, and there Evadne often found herself ensconced with Isabelle's Bible, during the long mornings when she was left to amuse herself as best she might. The atmosphere of the house stifled her, and Pompey had loved her father. It was scrupulously clean. Under Pompey's regime, spiders and moths found no tolerance, and a fine black cat effectually frightened away the audacious rodents, that were tempted to depredations by the toothsome cereals in the great bins. In one corner Pompey had improvised for her a luxurious couch of hay and rugs, and in this fragrant retreat Evadne studied her strange new book. She brought to it a mind absolutely untrammelled by creed or circumstance, and in this virgin soil God's truth took root. Slowly the light dawned. Hers was no shallow nature to leap to a hasty conclusion and then forsake it for a later thought. Gradually through the darkness, as God's flowers grow, this human flower lifted itself towards the light.

Sometimes she would sit for hours with the stately cat upon her knee, thinking, [illegible] while Pompey sang his favorite hymns about his work and the mellow strains floated up the stairway and soothed her lonely heart. His childlike [illegible] to her like a tower of refuge, and often when bewildered by life's inconsistencies, she felt as if the eternal realities were vanishing into mist, she was calmed and comforted by his happy trust.

"I cannot imagine, Evadne," said Isabelle one evening at dinner, "what pleasure you can find in sitting in a stable in company with a negro. It certainly shows a most depraved taste."

"What is there depraved about a stable? It should not have bad associations for a Christian. Christ was born in a stable, Isabelle."

"What in the world has that to do with you?"

"I am beginning to think he has everything to do with me," answered Evadne, quietly!

"Well," said Isabelle, with a toss of her head, "we are known by the company we keep. I should imagine Pompey's curriculum of manners was not on a very elevated plane."

"Pompey, Isabelle!" said Judge Hildreth suddenly. "Why my dear, Pompey is a modern Socrates bound in ebony. There is no danger to be apprehended from him."

"Well, it is a peculiar companionship for Judge Hildreth's niece, that is all I have to say," said Isabelle, coldly, "but every one to his taste."

"I read this morning in the Bible you lent me, that God had chosen the 'base things of the world, and things which are despised, and things which are not, to bring to naught things that are.' What does that mean, Isabelle?"

"Really, Evadne, we shall have to send you to live with Dr. Jerome," said her aunt, with a careless laugh. "You are getting to be a regular interrogation point. We are not Bible commentators, child. You cannot expect us to explain all the difficult passages."

"The Embroidery Club meets here today, Evadne," exclaimed Marion, "and I don't believe you have ever touched your table scarf since they were here before! What will Celeste Follingsby think? She works so rapidly, and her drawn work is a perfect poem."

"No, I have not," confessed Evadne. "It seems such silly work, to draw threads apart and then sew them together again."

Isabelle elevated her eyebrows with a look of horror. Louis laughed. "She's a hopeless case, Isabelle," he said. "You'll never convert her into an elegant trifler. You might as well throw up the contract."

"It seems to me, Evadne," said his sister, icily, "that you might have a little regard for the decorums of society. Don't, I beg of you, give utterance to such heresies before the girls. And I wish you would not call it my Bible, I did not make it."

"That is quite true, Evadne," said Louis, gravely. "If she had there would have been a good deal left out."

Isabelle shot an angry glance at him, but made no remark. Her brother's sarcasms were always received in silence.

"Eva," she said, after a pause, "I intend to call you by that name in future—your full one is too troublesome."

Evadne shivered. Her father was the only one who had ever abbreviated her name.

"I shall not answer to it," she said quietly.

"Why, pray?"

"Because, I suppose, in common with the rest of the lower animals, I have a natural repugnance to being cut in two."

"How tiresome you are," exclaimed Isabelle with a pout. "I do not object to my first syllable. All the girls at school call me Isa. Mamma, did you remember to order the tulle for our wings? Claude Rivers has finished hers and they are perfectly sweet! She showed them to me this afternoon."

"Wings, Isabelle! What in the world are you up to now?"

"A butterfly social, papa. We must raise money in some way. The church is frightfully in debt."

"That is a deplorable fact, but I did not know butterflies were famed as financiers."

"Oh, of course it is just for the novelty of the thing. The last social we had was a Mother Goose, and we have had Brownie suppers and pink teas and everything else we could think of. We must have something to attract you know."

"I wonder if it really pays?" ventured Marion. "It seems [illegible] much left, after you deduct the cost of the preparation. People might as well give the money outright. It would save them a world of trouble."

"Why, you silly child, it is to promote sociability in the church. As to the trouble, of course we do not count that. We must expect to make sacrifices."

"But they do not make the church any more sociable," said Marion boldly, who having struck for freedom of thought, was following up her advantage. "The same people take part every time and the others are left outside."

"Nonsense!" said Isabelle hotly. "It is only those who cannot afford to take part who are outside and it is a treat for them to look on."

"A sort of half-price theatre!" said Louis with a sneer.

"I don't believe they find the looking-on such fun as you think," said Marion, who was astonished at herself. "Suppose you try if they wouldn't like to take part, and offer your place in the cantata to Jemima Dobbs."

"Well done, Sis!" and Louis applauded softly.

Isabelle's lip curled. "Upon my word, Marion, you bid fair to become as hot an anarchist as Louise Michel! It is a mystery to me where you find out the Christian names of all the ungainly people in the congregation."

"Jemima Dobbs isn't dynamite, and I have no anarchical tendencies," persisted Marion stoutly, "but beauty is only skin-deep, Isabelle. She supports a sick mother and five children, and that is more than any of the rest of us could do," and Marion, frightened at her momentary temerity, shrank back into her shell.

"It is a most unaccountable thing, Lawrence," said Mrs. Hildreth, "why the church should be so heavily encumbered. I am sure you contribute handsomely and the pew rents are high. There is always a large congregation. I cannot understand."

"It is largely composed of tourists though, my dear, and they never carry more than a nickel in their pockets; so the weight of the burden falls upon a few. The expenses are very heavy. Jerome wants to make it the most popular church in the city, and the new quartette proves an expensive luxury."

"Oh, well," said Mrs. Hildreth, "of course one cannot grudge the money for that; professional singing is such an attraction. The way Madame Rialto took that high C last Sunday, was superb."

"Well," said Isabelle, "I don't think there is any doubt that Dr. Jerome is the most popular preacher in the city. He is going to preach next Sunday on the 'Moral Progress of Social Science,' and next month he commences his series of sermons on the 'Social Progress of the Day.' He takes such an interest in sociology."

"But why doesn't he preach Jesus Christ?" asked Evadne wonderingly.

"You will get to be a regular fanatic, Evadne, if you ring the changes on that subject so often. Dr. Jerome says he wants his people to have an intelligent idea of the progress of events. Of course, every one understands the Bible."

"I do think he is the loveliest man!" she continued rapturously. "He is so sympathetic, and Celeste Follingsby says he is perfectly heavenly in affliction. Her little sister died last week, you know. It is so awkward that it should have happened just now. She will not be able to take any part in the cantata, and she had the sweetest dress!"

"Very ill-timed of Providence," said Louis gravely. "What a pity it is, Isabelle, that you couldn't have the regulation of affairs." He yawned and strolled lazily towards the fire-place. When he looked round again, Evadne was the only other occupant of the room.

"Well, coz, what do you think of the situation? I belong to the worldlings, of course, but I confess the idea of Jesus Christ at a Butterfly Social is tremendously incongruous. You'll find it a hopelsss task Evadne, to make the Bible and modern Christianity agree."

"So much the worse, then, for modern Christianity," said Evadne. "I know little of it, but I am learning about Christ."

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE

FEATHERED FRIENDS

Studying the Ways of the Doves and Pigeons —Suggestions for a Home Club

WHAT the rose is among flowers, the dove is among birds. As there are unnumbered varieties of the one, there are numberless species of the other, doves and pigeons being first and second cousins, and belonging alike to the one great family-group. Many of our little readers have pigeon-roosts or dove-cotes. All who have, we are sure, never forget their birds when snow is on the ground and their pretty charges are dependant for daily fare upon a little master's or mistress' thoughtful provision of crumbs. Perplexed mammas, who want to entertain little folks during long winter evenings, might find a study of the dove or pigeon interesting to possessors of such pets.

The study of doves and pigeons will lead the children far afield into enchanted countries and ages, to the Holy Land and to the study of Christ's life. On the standards of Assyrians and Babylonians, the dove went before them into battle—strange place and circumstance for the symbol of peace and gentleness! In Syria and Phœnicia, the dove was a pagan ensign and divinity; and as a sacred bird, its flesh was forbidden food. Egyptian priests sent carrier-doves forth from temples, bearing grave and sometimes cruel messages; kings entrusted secrets of state to their conveyance; the prisoner sent and received words of comfort, and the lover sings:

> I wrote a letter to my love,
> And gave it to a tender dove.

The naval and military service of the world to-day seeks to utilize the homing instinct of the pigeon where telegraph and mail-bags would be unavailable. So dove and pigeon, representing the world's first postal system, in spite of the wonders of progress and invention, are still expected to do high service. The dove's flight possessed, in pagan eyes, prophetic significance; and soothsayers in the East still watch the flight of doves for purposes of divination. In parts of Russia, doves and pigeons are held in superstitious veneration; no one kills them, and a hungry mujik will share his scanty fare with them.

The children will be sure to read and to tell of the doves that hover about the wonderful old church of St. Mark's, in Venice. Tourists feel that a visit to Venice is incomplete unless they have fed these birds. Each child will have his version of how St. Mark's doves, fluttering down familiarly upon the helmets, sabres and muskets of Napoleon's invading soldiers, turned their attention from ruder occupations to the most gentle pastime of feeding and caressing these pretty, cooing visitants.

The dove sent forth from the ark was the world's first messenger. Doves were the only birds in the ancient sacrificial code of the Hebrews, and were substitutes where parents were too poor to buy lambs. Thus, we read that when Jesus was eight days old, "they brought him to Jerusalem to present him to the Lord . . . and to offer a sacrifice . . . according to the law of the Lord, a pair of turtle-doves or two young pigeons." When Jesus was baptized, the Holy Ghost descended "like a dove upon him."

Ornithology will show the children that the dove has some ways which might be improved upon—for instance, Mrs. Turtle-dove might mourn less and build her nest better. Wild pigeons have been common to America in such numbers as to ruin crops; Wilson (Audubon's comrade), estimated one flock which he saw at nearly twenty-five million birds; and now, they have been slaughtered to such extent, that the danger arises of their total extermination. The children will find that ornithology, like history, is an enchanted land, wherein stand the great pigeon-towers of Persia; through which fly the white-and-rose carrier-pigeons of Scandiroon; and in which the ways of one's own every-day pets—the birds which fly down from their cote to take their dinner out of one's own hand or sister's apron, have honorable place. Studying the ways of pigeons, little folks pay passing compliments to other birds; they acquire habits of observation; and learn to treat with respect the lives and rights of our winged friends—of the very humblest of whom, the little sparrow—Jesus said: "Not one of them is forgotten before God."

FEEDING THE DOVES IN WINTER

A New Boys' Brigade

A new kind of boys' brigade, which has been recently started, and which eliminates the military element, will doubtless be organized in many Sunday Schools during the new year. It is known as the "Boys' Life-Guard Brigade." It has ambulance drill, fire drill, and saving-from-drowning drill. Its standard of heroism is high and practical; and yet it teaches that true heroism must be a matter of every-day life—entering into all its common-place details. On its roll of honor will be inscribed the name of any boy who rescues a life from fire, water, or other peril, or the boy who by his example truly influences the lives of other boys. Members must be over the age of twelve, total abstainers, and are required to conduct themselves in a quiet and orderly manner.

"Beautiful Mother"

"My mamma is the prettiest," said Bessie. "No, mine," insisted Sue. "My mamma," Baby Will stoutly declared, "is the prettiest ever was;" and so the contention went on in the nursery where Bessie was entertaining friends, until Bessie's mamma had to act as umpire and settle the question by assuring each little one that of course his or her mamma was prettiest for him or her. Was there ever a mamma whom her little ones did not think beautiful? Many famous men and women have carried this belief all through life, as did George Ebers, for instance. In his writings he dwells on his mother's tenderness, on her beauty, and her influence. In fact it runs like a silver thread through all his reminiscences.

The Guest in the Home

There are guests, says Margaret Sangster, in Home Life Made Beautiful, who can come into the family like a tone of music sounding in harmony with the family chord. They do not ignore with cool indifference the children or the aged. They do not keep meals waiting; they do not order the servants; they do not presume upon the hospitality shown to cause inconvenience or in any way interrupt family life. They do not mar the beauty of the guest-room by disorder; their presence is a benediction; their going causes heartfelt regret. Such guests do not accept hospitality and afterwards speak slightingly or critically of their entertainers. Such guests are ever welcome.

OLD DAYS AND NEW

AS the musician's deft touch wakes
An unforgotten strain,
Whereat eyes sparkle, or grow moist—
Hearts throb with joy, or pain;

So would my feebler pen invoke
O'er memory's realm a spell,
To win for us, from auld lang syne,
Treasures we loved so well.

Home of our youth! echo again
Our laughter, sport and song;
Again our peaceful refuge be
From peril, fear and wrong.

Have these fled joys the power alone,
Fond memory's ear to charm?
Faith listens too, and, smiling, says:
"Dear hearts, have no alarm;

A home more joyous far, more fair,
Your loved ones now behold,
And hand in hand with them, you shall Walk through its streets of gold."

WM. S. HARTT.

Brothers and Sisters

"I COULD never be satisfied to marry a man who was not as good as my brother." It was at an afternoon tea-party, and a group of girls had drifted into the discussion of motives for marriage. An absent member of their circle had married a man "to reform" him, and now the girls, hearing of grave misfortunes that had come upon her, were planning a way to help her.

"Somehow," said the speaker, "I always blame a girl's brother if she likes unworthy men. Hal has made that sort of thing impossible to me. He is such a paragon that he has trained me to expect extraordinary things of men. And my heart just aches for girls who have wicked brothers. I feel that their future is so unsafe. Dissipated men bring their associates around—and then they carry their own atmosphere with them, and their sisters learn not to expect much of men; they have no true ideal of manly character. Rob was introduced to Margie by her own brother." Perhaps the speaker went too far, but there is a good deal of truth in what she says—a truth that we mothers may turn to large advantage. There isn't a brother in the world that will not be a better man for realizing that his character will effect his sister's character and her fortune in life. We continually and rightly tell our little girls that they must so be and so live that their brothers will think highly of women; and this incentive has been productive of much that is excellent and beautiful in womanly character. Are we equally kind to our little boys? Do we as constantly and faithfully impress upon them as upon our girls, the creed that they must so be and so live that their sisters will think highly of men? Our boys will respond to this argument when we bring it home to them with careful, prayerful, loving force. Teach them, as little fellows, to "help sister to be good."

A Letter from Admiral Dewey

The following letter shows a hitherto unknown side of the character of the hero of Manila and America's man of steel. Jesse Noss belonged to the Tenth Pennsylvania Volunteers; his daughter, referred to in the letter, was born after his departure, and died after he fell. The letter is dated from Manila:

MY DEAR MRS. NOSS:—I wish to express to you my deepest sympathy. It must lessen your sorrow somewhat to know that your young husband fell fighting bravely for his country. From the Olympia I watched the famous fight on that fearful night and wondered how many American homes would be saddened by the martyrdom suffered by our brave men, and my sympathy went out to each and every one of them. Your loss has been sadder than the others, and I am unable to express the sorrow I feel for you. Tears come to my eyes as I read the sad story of the father who never saw his child, and then the loss of all that was left to the brave mother. It is hard sometimes to believe, but our Heavenly Father in his infinite goodness always does things for the best, and some day father, mother and daughter will be joined never again to be parted. With my tenderest sympathy, believe me your sincere friend.

GEORGE DEWEY.

FRIENDS IN COUNCIL

Amiable Fault Finding. A Perplexed Girl. Social Duties of a Pastor's Wife, etc.

I SUPPOSE there is not one of us dear friends, who does not now and then exclaim, apropos of some act or speech of our sons and brothers, "Just like a man!" Occasionally, too, the man retorts good humoredly, when some word or deed of one of us strikes him as a wee bit out of proportion, "Just like a woman!" Taking us big and large as a race, human beings have very much in common, but there are little peculiarities and distinctions which appertain to sex, which make the man especially manly, and the woman notably womanly. When we glibly use the phrase above quoted, however, we seldom do it in a spirit of admiration. It is usually in a mood of banter, perhaps of amiable fault-finding that we fling our little pebble of amusement at our blundering Johns and Harrys, and laughing at their odd ways, say, "Isn't that just like a man?" And I haven't the least doubt that with John and Harry the case is much the same.

I HAD a letter last night from a perplexed girl, who writes to me to complain that her father, an excellent parent in other respects, and a thoroughly good man, I fancy, is unreasonably inconsiderate of her mother and herself, in the matter of tidiness. "I like to see the house pretty, and I work hard to have it nice and neat, and papa throws his things about, and takes no care whatever. He just upsets and makes confusion, and I am at my wit's end, and so is mamma."

Well, my dear, I cannot comfort you with the hope that your father will be very likely to change his habits. I know some charming men, a number of them, in fact, who have a similar disregard for the orderly arrangement of the home, who must be followed about and picked up after, and allowed to be comfortable without too much nagging. There are men who may be tracked from room to room in the house by the trail of dropped newspapers, handkerchiefs, hats, etc., etc., which they leave in their wake. If a young woman happens to marry one of these dear, disorderly people, she need not expect to reform him, and may just as well lovingly condone the little inconveniences of her lot. For my part, as between the masculine Miss Nancy, who has a finger in every domestic pie, and the masculine Sir Heedless, who takes no note of affairs not in his province, and needs a good deal of motherly, wifely and sisterly caretaking and excusing, I prefer the latter. Of all trying and irritating personages, a martinet man of the house carries off the palm.

BUT the remedy for the really exasperating footlessness of certain good men, who do seem to blame in their bull-in-a-china-shop careers through home-life, is in the hands of mothers. To begin with your daughter-in-law's husband, and train him to have a place for everything and everything in its place, is your right and bounden duty, dear lady, whose small John is to-day under your hand, to govern and mould for all the coming days.

M. F. G. It is not customary to exact calls on the congregation from the wife of the pastor. She is usually very much pleased to have the ladies call on her, but you can readily see that if she is compelled to call on all the families in the church, she will have very little time for any of the other duties which fall on her, as her husband's wife, the mother of his children and the mistress of his house. When your pastor and his wife set aside and announce a weekly afternoon and evening when they will be at home to the members of the congregation, they are showing real hospitality, and making it easy for every one to know when to find them at leisure. The people should frankly avail themselves of this courtesy, and should be at liberty to go often on the appointed evening, not confining themselves to a single call. But I do not think they should expect, Madame, the minister's wife to call generally on the congregation. She is at liberty, like any other lady, to select her special circle of intimate acquaintances. The pastor, too, ought not to use up valuable time in calls that are merely social, though, if aware of need for his presence, he will always call on the sick and the afflicted. It is only fair to a pastor to notify him when his visits are especially desired.

SUSIE V. T. Do not be afraid to wash your face every day with hot water and a good toilet soap. Of course, having made a lather and carefully rubbed it into the pores with gentle, not rough, pressure you must rinse it thoroughly off. Use soap only once a day. By looking at a lace veil and seeing how much dust lodges in its fine meshes, you can get an idea of how the pores of the skin become clogged with dust.

Strange New Shrub that Cures Kidney and Bladder Diseases, Rheumatism, etc. Free.

We have previously described the new botanic discovery, Alkavis, which proves a specific cure for diseases caused by Uric acid in the blood, or disorder of the Kidneys or urinary organs. It is now stated that Alkavis is a product of the well known Kava-Kava Shrub, and is a specific cure for these diseases just as quinine is for malaria. Hon. R. C. Wood, of Lowell, Ind., writes that in four weeks Alkavis cured him of Kidney and bladder disease of ten year's standing, and Rev. Thomas M. Owen, of West Pawlet, Vt., gives similar testimony. Many ladies also testify to its wonderful curative powers in disorders peculiar to womanhood. The only importers of Alkavis so far are the Church Kidney Cure Co., of 409 Fourth Avenue, New York, and they are so anxious to prove its value that for the sake of introduction they will send a free treatment of Alkavis prepaid by mail to every reader of The Christian Herald who is a Sufferer from any form of Kidney or Bladder disorder, Bright's Disease, Rheumatism, Dropsy, Gravel, Pain in Back, Female Complaints, or other affliction due to improper action of the Kidneys or Urinary Organs. We advise all Sufferers to send their names and address to the company, and receive the Alkavis free. It is sent to you entirely free, to prove its wonderful curative power.

A PRESENT HELP

THERE is never a day so dreary,
But God can make it bright;
And unto the soul that trusts Him,
He giveth songs in the night.
There is never a path so hidden,
But God will show the way,
If we seek for the Spirit's guidance,
And patiently watch and pray.

There is never a cross so heavy,
But the loving hands are there,
Outstretched in tender compassion,
The burden to help us bear.
There is never a heart that is broken,
But the loving Christ can heal,
For the heart that was pierced on Calvary,
Doth still for His people feel.

There is never a life so burdened,
So hopeless and so unblest,
But may be filled with the light of God,
And enter His promised rest.
There is never a sin or a sorrow,
There is never a care or a loss,
But we may carry to Jesus,
And leave at the foot of the Cross.

What more can we ask than He's promised,
And we know that His word cannot fail,
Our refuge when storms are impending,
Our help when temptations assail.
Our Saviour, our Friend, and Redeemer,
Our portion on earth and in heaven;
For He who withheld not His own dear Son,
Hath with Him all things freely given.

Changed by the Gospel

"Have you ever heard the Gospel before?" a Chinaman was asked, who had come into a mission room for the first time. "No," he replied, "but I have seen it! I know a man who used to be the terror of his neighborhood. If you gave him a hard word, he would shoot at you, and curse you. He was as dangerous as a wild beast, and a hard opium smoker; but when the religion of Jesus took hold of him he became wholly changed. He is gentle, moral, and has left off opium. Truly, the teaching is good."

Consumption and Other Lung Diseases Cured by a New Discovery.

As stated in a previous issue the Alpha Medical Institute posseses the secret of a positive cure for Consumption and allied Lung Diseases. Additional testimony to this great discovery is daily accumulating. Many remarkable letters are to hand, including sworn testimony from sufferers cured of most severe cases of Consumption, Catarrh, Bronchitis and Asthma. Among these are letters from Hon. A. J. Farrow, Morton, Ind.; Rev. M. W. Kenney, La Crescent, Minn.; Mrs. John Lexa, Manly, Iowa, and many others. To prove its great power, the Institute will for the next sixty days send this New Treatment entirely free to all who apply. If you are in need of help we advise you to accept this most generous offer. Send your address, name of nearest express office and all particulars of your disease to the Alpha Medical Institute, No. 562 Sycamore Street, Cincinnati, Ohio, and they will at once send you their Book and free Home Treatment as stated.

Thousands of people have found in Hood's Sarsaparilla a positive cure for rheumatism. This medicine by its purifying action neutralizes the acidity of the blood and builds up the system.

RHEUMATISM QUICKLY CURED.

In an article contributed to the London Lancet, a Philadelphia physician says: "Tartarlithine has given me results beyond all comparison superior to any preparation which I have tried. The promptness of its action is in many cases astonishing, a subsidence of distressing symptoms quickly following the administration of three doses of five grains each, taken four hours apart in a half pint of water on a reasonably empty stomach. The use of the preparation in the quantities named has sufficed in all cases so far treated, about twenty in number, to practically cure the disorder, temporarily at least.

EUCALOL treatment is based on antiseptic cleanliness—the method used in the nose and throat hospitals of New York and Philadelphia. It is not the catch-penny cure-all of the quack, but a prescription perfected by years of scientific trial and study by the leading specialists in the world.

It consists of an antiseptic wash to thoroughly cleanse the nostrils, removing all accumulated mucous and dry scabs, and the application of the antiseptic Eucalol Cream, healing and soothing the irritated mucous membrane. Both are pleasant to use, the effect is instantaneous and delightful, and persistency in their use is sure to effect a cure. The Eucalol Treatment is so cheap as to be within the means of everyone. The free trial offer makes it possible to try it without risking a cent. Address

THE HAIR 27th Ed. Its Care, or Shampoo, and the Remedy. By Prof. HARRY PARKER. D. G. TONG & CO., 161 Arch St., Phila., Pa. "Every one should read this little book."—

WHITHER AM I GOING?

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Jan. 15. Ps. 119: 57-64

A MORE important question can no man put to his own soul. It is necessary to ask it because of the common tendency to drift. There is no standing still in life. Every year finds us farther in one direction or the other, than the former year. The progress may be almost imperceptible, but it is sure. It is well therefore, that at frequent intervals we examine ourselves and ask the question, "Whither am I going?" The answer must come from existing tendencies that can be easily recognized. Our course in this world is like that of a boat on a river. If the rower sits idle, the course of the boat will be with the stream. If he wishes to go up the river he must put forth his strength and exert himself to overcome resistance. And this effort is precisely that which everyone who aspires to do the best with his own life, must make. His physical nature tends downward. If he yields to its desires and appetites and indulges them, his tendency is to the level of the brutes. His body may develop, but his spiritual nature degenerates. That is the easiest course, and it is the common one. The spiritual does not acquire and maintain rule over the animal in human nature without vigorous and persistent effort. Thus the question, "Whither am I going?" must be determined by self-examination, for it depends on this struggle. The way of self-indulgence is toward the rapids; but the way of self-control is upward toward the throne of God itself. But self-control to the one who finds that he is on the wrong course is impossible. Happily for us, there is a better word that has power in it. Our failure discourages us, until we learn to substitute for self-control, Christ-control. To give our lives into his hand, to receive into our souls the power of his divine nature, is the only way to success. With that, we cease to drift, and begin the course which leads to infinite development. In all the ages, there has been no secret like this. The drunkard, the gambler, the libertine, have tried it, and have found their downward course arrested, and have begun the course heavenward. Therefore, let the question, "Whither am I going?" fill no one with despair. Christ will give the victory to all who put their trust in him.

The Tract Society and the War

The American Tract Society has done a large amount of work in the army and navy during the past summer in the distribution of literature, and including also extensive service in the hospital. The demand for the service continues in the army of encampment and occupation. Many do not realize this, but those who are face to face with the situation feel that the necessity for it is quite equal to that which existed during active hostilities. The missionaries of the American Tract Society were active in the hospital work as well as in camp and on shipboard.

"God Claims You"

It is [illegible] that when he was a mere lad he once heard three words which made a memorable impression upon him—"God claims you." Then came the question, "What am I going to do with the claim?" He answered, "I will own it, and give myself to God." He [illegible] told his mother, "God claims me." At school and college his motto was, "God claims me." As a member of Parliament, and subsequently as Lord Chancellor, it was still, "God claims me." When he was appointed Lord Chancellor, he was teacher of a large Bible-class, and his minister, thinking that now he would not have time to devote to that purpose, said to him, "I suppose you will now require to give up your class?" "No," was the reply, "I will not; God claims me."

A GOOD PRACTICE.

If You Want a Good Appetite and Perfect Digestion.

After each meal dissolve one or two of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets in the mouth and mingling with the food, they constitute a perfect digestive, absolutely safe for the most sensitive stomach.

They digest the food before it has time to ferment, thus preventing the formation of gas and keeping the blood pure and free from the poisonous products of fermented, half-digested food.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets make the complexion clear by keeping the blood pure.

They increase flesh by digesting flesh-forming foods.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets is the only remedy designed especially for the cure of stomach troubles and nothing else.

One disease, one remedy, the successful physician of today is the specialist, the successful medicine is the medicine prepared especially for one disease.

A whole package taken at one time would not hurt you, but would simply be a waste of good material.

Over six thousand men and women in the state of Michigan alone have been cured of indigestion and dyspepsia by the use of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets.

Sold by all druggists at 50 cents per package.

ARE YOUR LUNGS WEAK?

To Every Sufferer from Catarrh, Lung Weakness or Consumption a Great Specialist Sends His New and Wonderful

TREATMENT REFE.

Nearly everybody you meet will regard it as a kind of insult to be asked if they have weak lungs. All seem to have a solid faith in the soundness of their own breathing machine. In cases of trouble they will admit there is a "heavy cold," "a touch of bronchitis," or even "a spell of Asthma," but as to weak or unsound lungs, never, NEVER. Even the poor consumptive who scarcely speaks without coughing, whose cheeks are wasted, hollow and bear the hectic flush of doom, will assure you with glistening eyes that his cold is on the mend and he will be all right when the weather changes.

This is a sad and pitiable form of delusion. It is not our business here to discuss the reason of it. Its prevalence, however, is beyond all doubt, and we feel that we are right in holding it responsible for a neglect of serious sible dangers. Nobody can afford to neglect them or "let them wear out," or "get better in the spring," or any other tomfoolery that leads only to wreck and ruin. Lung troubles don't move backward. Weak lungs don't grow strong by themselves—you must heal them and strengthen them and rid them of the very earliest germs of disease or you are simply committing a form of suicide. Either you must cure your lung troubles or THEY WILL KILL YOU.

That's the whole situation in a nutshell.

Never was there a cure for lung troubles equal to the newly discovered Dr. Slocum treatment. This forms a system of three remedies that are used simultaneously, and supplement each other's curative action. The treatment has immortalized Dr. Slocum's name. It cures weak lungs, bronchitis, asthma, coughs, consumption, catarrh and every other ailment lung troubles in ourselves and others—that it is almost criminal.

How many a poor bread-earner there is who keeps on and on at his daily toil, taking cough medicines by fits and starts, but never quite curing his cough, while this same cough is but a symptom of decay that is eating into his lungs, and will in time cause their destruction. Thus does a wife observe her husband, or parents witness the struggle of a darling child, the youth or the maiden who was to rejoice their later years, while no steps are taken to battle with the evil until consumption has seized on one more victim. It is simply terrible to think how far we may be guilty by our indifference to the lung troubles of those near and dear to us. It is also a sad thought that we may hug a delusion as to our own health that we only get rid of when life itself must pay the forfeit.

Let us quit the distressing subject to come to what is practical. Nobody can afford to think lightly of lung troubles. Nobody can afford to be mistaken about their possible dangers. Nobody can afford to neglect them or "let them wear out," or "get better in the spring," or any other tomfoolery that leads only to wreck and ruin. Lung troubles don't move backward. Weak lungs don't grow strong by themselves—you must heal them and strengthen them and rid them of the very earliest germs of disease or you are simply committing a form of suicide. Either you must cure your lung troubles or THEY WILL KILL YOU.

That's the whole situation in a nutshell.

Never was there a cure for lung troubles equal to the newly discovered Dr. Slocum treatment. This forms a system of three remedies that are used simultaneously, and supplement each other's curative action. The treatment has immortalized Dr. Slocum's name. It cures weak lungs, bronchitis, asthma, coughs, consumption, catarrh and every other ailment of the pulmonary region. It destroys every germ that can affect the respiratory system, and even in advanced stages of lung trouble positively arrests the tubercular growth, while it also builds up the patient so that his system is enabled to throw off scrofula, rheumatism and other wasting diseases. Thousands of cured cases already prove these claims. Thousands of grateful people bless the discovery.

Dr. Slocum wants everybody to know the surprising merits of his system. He has arranged to give a free treatment (three bottles of the cure) to all sufferers who will apply to him by letter, mentioning The Christian Herald. Full instructions for use accompany each treatment. Your correspondence on the subject is strictly private and your three free bottles come to you in a plain package. Surely if you have weak lungs you will be glad to get a free treatment that is offered in such a generous spirit.

Delay only makes your trouble worse.

Have You Catarrh?

You can easily determine whether you have Catarrh. The doctors can tell no better than you. The symptoms are self-evident and absolute. Have you a cold in the head or a discharge from the nose? Does phlegm drop into the throat? Do you have a dull headache, foul breath, husky voice or treacherous memory? Is your throat inflamed? Are there noises in your ears? Is your hearing bad? Do you catch a cold by slight exposure?

These symptoms indicate Catarrh, which, if neglected, may develop into Consumption. Delay increases the danger. More deaths result from Catarrh than from any other cause.

Send us your address, and we will send you by mail, absolutely free, a trial sample of Dr. Blosser's Catarrh Cure, together with everything necessary to its use. Not one cent expense to you. This is the only safe and reliable Catarrh Cure known to medical science. Pastor of Eight Churches

Rev. Warren G. Partridge and his Far-Reaching Spiritual Charge in Cincinnati—The Ninth Street Baptist Church a "Mother of Churches"—Revival Fires Kept Brightly Burning, and a Great Army of Organized Christian Workers Laboring Earnestly for Souls

STATION A, HUNT STREET

"MOTHER of Churches" is the endearing name which has been fitly given to the remarkable church organization, the outlines of whose history are given below. The record may serve as an encouragement to other churches and a stimulus to all who love the association of fellow Christians in the service of the Master. . . . The Ninth Street Baptist Church, of Cincinnati, O., was organized on the ninth of Nov., 1830, sixty-eight years ago. There were only nineteen members at that time, but now there are about 1,600, it being the largest Baptist congregation in Ohio, and one of the largest Baptist churches in this country. The historic edifice has had very distinguished pastors, and the following names may be mentioned: Rev. Samuel W. Lynd, D.D., Rev. E. L. Magoon, D.D., Rev. Ezekiel Robinson, LL.D., who became President of Brown University; Rev. Wm. F. Hansell, Rev. E. T. Robinson, Rev. Wayland Hoyt, D.D., Rev. F. M. Ellis, D.D., Rev. Reuben Jeffery, D.D., Rev. Samuel W. Duncan, D.D., Rev. Johnston Myers, D.D. The present pastor is Rev. Warren G. Partridge, D.D., who is serving his fourth year.

The Ninth Street Church is the mother of Baptist churches; and her members have scattered all over this country, and are now working in other cities. Two Baptist churches have gone out from this church, as colonies, and are now strong Baptist churches in Cincinnati. Many rich members have been lost in this way, in order to build up other churches. Ninth Street Church is a down-town church, and is at the centre of a vast population of almost 500,000 souls in this great city. This down-town church has made a successful attempt to reach the masses. While some other churches have moved to the suburbs, or have closed their doors, or are one-quarter filled with people, this church has enlarged its boundaries, and augmented its numbers and power, amid the increasing difficulties of the down-town population.

This remarkable church has some very unique characteristics. It has built chapels in the most neglected parts of the city until it now has seven of these "stations." These chapels are situated in different parts of the city, and are all the way from one to five miles from the home church. The mother church is thus the centre of power and influence, and is surrounded by her seven daughters. The mother church thus reaches out her seven great motherly hands to save the city. Here are, then, eight evangelistic centres. On Sunday nights, in all seasons of the year, the home church is crowded, often chairs being used in the aisles, while preaching services are being conducted at the same hour at the seven chapels. The revival fires are thus kept burning all the year round; and there are baptisms of happy converts at the home church on almost every Sunday in the year. There is a great "after-meeting" at the home church after the sermon on every Sunday night in the year; and the large Sunday School room is crowded in July and August, as well as in winter. From 600 to 700 people attend this wonderful meeting every Sunday night. The singing is very enthusiastic and inspiring. This church has no quartette or choir. A precentor leads the people in congregational singing. A cornetist also leads in this part of the service. The pastor, Dr. Partridge, has but one male assistant, Wm. E. Parry, who, with consecrated laymen, preaches at the seven chapels on Sunday nights. This work has developed laymen who prove themselves very efficient in practical city mission work. Many men and women cheerfully give their services, without compensation, to this work of city evangelization.

There are no wealthy people in the church, and the members make great sacrifices in time, money and strength to carry on this remarkable work. The buildings together have a seating capacity of over 4,000. Over 1,000 people attend the prayer meetings weekly, and the attendance at the Friday night prayer meeting at the home church will average about 600. Many people from different parts of the country attend this meeting, and pronounce it a meeting of great power and inspiration.

Another characteristic of this working church is the system of branch Sunday Schools. In the neglected part of the city, amid the densest population, Sunday Schools have been started, until this church has now nine Sunday Schools with over 3,000 scholars. There are nine superintendents and over 200 teachers. The Sunday School at the home church is held at 9 A.M., and the other eight schools are held at 2.30 P.M. Some teachers teach two classes every Sunday. Many teachers live in the suburbs; Rev. Dr. Lasher, editor of The Journal and Messenger, comes about twelve miles every Sunday morning, at 9 o'clock, to teach his Bible class. Others come long distances, either on the steam cars or on the electrics. When the Sunday School picnic is given in the summer, it requires about three trains of cars to convey the great crowds to the picnic grounds. Some years, at Christmas time, a great Christmas festival has been held in the immense music hall, which has been crowded with the scholars and their friends, altogether about 7,000 people being present. Last month there were eight Christmas entertainments at the home church and the seven chapels, and about 5,000 people were in attendance at the eight entertainments.

Another feature of the church work is the Institutional Department. Four years ago the church bought a large public school property adjoining the church. It was one of the large intermediate school buildings of the city. This building has been utilized for institutional methods of modern church work. It is called "The Annex." It makes a splendid parish house. In this department of work there are maintained the following branches: daily free kindergarten, kitchen garden, sacred literature class, eight industrial and sewing schools, eight singing schools, Chinese Sunday School, children's meetings, boy's and girl's brigades, employment bureau, ice-water fountain in front of the church in summer, men's club, relief department for the deserving poor, reading-rooms, gymnasium, literary societies, services for deaf mutes, drum corps, hospital corps, night classes in stenography, etc., lectures and entertainments. This is one of the most active institutional churches in this country. All the seats are free. The work is carried on by voluntary offerings. There are over eighty different services every week, or over eleven services every day. The doors are open, day and night. Its ideal is to be a ministering church. It ministers to the physical, social, moral, intellectual, and spiritual needs of mankind. But its great aim is to save the souls of men. Soul-winning goes on during every week in the

UNDER WHOSE MINISTRY MANY NEW CHURCHES HAVE SPRUNG UP

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

A New Census

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: II. Samuel 18: 3. . . . Thou art worth ten thousand of us

ONE of the most wondrous characters of his time was David. A red-haired boy, he could shepherd a flock, or carry "ten loaves and ten slices of milk cheese to his brothers in the regiment," or with leathern thong, stone loaded, bring down a giant whose armor weighed two hundred weight of metal, or cause a lion which roared at him in rage to roar with pain as he flung it, dying, to the roadside, or could marshal a host, or rule an empire, or thumb a harp so skilfully that it cured Saul's dementia—a harp from whose strings dripped pastorals, elegies, lyrics, triumphal marches, benedictions. Now, this man, a combination of music and heroics, of dithyrambs and battlefields, of country quietudes and statesmanship, is to fit out a military expedition. Four thousand troops, according to Josephus, were sent into the field. The captains were put in command of the companies, and the colonels in command of the regiments, which were disposed into right wing, left wing, and centre. General Joab, General Abishai and General Ittai are to lead these three divisions; but who shall take the field as Commander-in-chief? David offers his services, and proposes to go to the front. He will lead them in the awful charge, for he has not a cowardly nerve in all his body. He did not propose to have his troops go into perils which he himself would not brave, and the battlefield required as much courage then as now, for the opposing forces must, in order to do any execution at all, come up to within positive reach of sabre and spear. But there came up from the troops and from civilians a mighty protest against David's taking the field. His life was too important to the nation. If he went down, the empire went down; whereas, if the whole four thousand of the ranks were slain, another army might be marshalled and the defeat turned into victory. The army and the nation practically cried out, "No! No! You can not go to the front. We estimate you as ten thousand men. 'Thou art worth ten thousand of us!'"

That army and that nation, then and there reminded David, and now remind us, of the fact which we forget, or never appreciate at all, that some people are morally or spiritually worth far more than others, and some worth far less. The census and statistics of neighborhoods, of churches, of nations, serve their purpose, but they can never accurately express the real state of things. The practical subject that I want to present to-day is that those who have especial opportunity, especial graces, especial wealth, especial talent, especial eloquence, ought to make up by especial assiduity and consecration for those who have less opportunities and less gifts. You ought to do ten times more for God and human uplifting than those who have only a tenth of your equipment. The rank and the file of the four thousand of the text told the truth when they said, "Thou art worth ten thousand of us."

In no city of its size are there so many men of talent as are gathered in this capital of the American nation. Some of the States are at times represented by men who have neither talents nor good morals. Their political party compensates them for partisan services by sending them to Congress, or by securing for them position in the war or navy or pension or printing departments. They were nobodies before they left home, and they are nobodies here. But they are exceptional. All the States of the Union generally send their most talented men, and men of exemplary lives and noble purposes. Some of them have the gifts and qualifications of ten men, of a hundred men—yea, of a thousand men—and their constituents could truthfully employ the words of my text and say, "Thou art worth ten thousand of us."

With such opportunity are they augmenting their usefulness in every possible direction? Many of them are, some of them are not. It is a stupendous thing to have power—political power, social power, official power. It has often been printed and often quoted as one of the wise sayings of the ancients, "Knowledge is power." Yet it may as certainly be power for evil as for good. The lightning express rail train has power for good, if it is on the track, but horrible power for disaster if it leaves the track and plunges down the embankment. The ocean steamer has power for good, sailing in right direction and in safe waters and under good helmsman and wide-awake watchman on the lookout, but indescribable power for evil if under full headway it strikes the breakers. As steam power or electricity or water forces may be stored in boilers, in dynamos, in reservoirs, to be employed all over a town or city, so God sometimes puts in one man enough faith to supply thousands of men with courage. If a man happens to be thus endowed, let him realize his opportunity and improve it. At this time millions of men are atremble lest this nation make a mistake and enter upon some policy of government for the islands of the sea that will founder the republic. God will give to a few men on both sides of this question faith and courage for all the rest. There are two false positions many are now taking, false as false can be. The one is that if we decline to take under full charge Cuba and Porto Rico and the Philippines, we make a declination that will be disastrous to our nation, and other nations will take control of those archipelagoes and rule them, and perhaps to our humiliation and destruction. The other theory is that if we take possession of those once Spanish colonies, we invite foreign interference, and enter upon a career that will finally be the demolition of this government. Both positions are immeasurable mistakes. God has set apart this continent for free government and the triumphs of Christianity, and we may take either the first or the second course without ruin. We may say to those islands, "We do not want you, but we have set you free; now stay free, while we see that the Spanish panther never again puts its paw on your neck." Or we may invite the annexation of Cuba and Porto Rico, and say to the Philippines, "Get ready, by education and good morals, for free government, and at the right time you shall be one of our territories, on the way to be one of our States." God is on the side of the right, and by earnest imploration for divine guidance on the part of this nation we will be led to do the right. We are on the brink of nothing. There is no frightful crisis. This train of Republican and Democratic institutions is a through train, and all we want is to have the engineer and the brakemen and the conductor attend to their business and the passengers keep their places. We want men in this nation with faith enough for all. We want here and there a David worth ten thousand men.

A vast majority of men have no surplus of confidence for others and hardly enough confidence for themselves. They go through life saying depressing things and doing depressing things. They chill prayer-meetings, discourage charitable institutions, injure commerce, and kill churches. They blow out lights when they ought to be kindling them. They hover around a dull fire on their own hearth, and take up so much room that no one can catch the least caloric, instead of stirring the hearth into a blaze, the crackle of whose back-log would invite the whole neighborhood to come in to feel the abounding warmth and see the transfiguration of the faces. As we all have to guess a great deal about the future, let us guess something good, for it will be more encouraging, and the guess will be just as apt to come true. What a lot of ingrates the Lord has at his table! People who have had three meals a day for fifty years, and yet fear that they will soon have to rattle their knife and fork on an empty dinner plate. How many have had, winter and spring and summer and fall, clothing for sixty years, but expect an empty wardrobe shortly! How many have lived under free institutions all their days, but fear that the United States may be telescoped in some foreign collision! Oh, but the taxes have gone up. Yes, but thank God, it is easier, with money, to pay the taxes, now that they are up, than it was without money, to pay the taxes when they were down. We want a few men who have faith in God and that mighty future which holds several things, among them a millennium. Columbanus said to his friend, "Deicolus, why are you always smiling?" The reply was, "Because no one can take my God from me!" We want more men to feel that they have a mission to cheer others and to draw up the corners of people's mouths which have a long while been drawn down—more Davids who can shepherd whole flocks of bright hopes, and can play a harp of encouragement, and strike down a Goliath of despair, and of whom we can say, "Thou art worth ten thousand of us."

The regiments mobilized for the defence of the throne of Israel, were right in protesting against David's exposure of his life at the front. Had he been pierced of an arrow, or cloven down with a battle-ax, or fatally slung from snorting war-charger, what a disaster for the throne of Israel! Absalom, his son, was a low fellow, and unfit to reign, his two chief characteristics were his handsome face and his long hair—so long, that when he had it cut, that which was scissored off, weighed "two hundred shekels, after the king's weight," and when a man has nothing but a handsome face and an exuberance of hair, there is not much of him. The capture or slaying of David would have been a calamity irreparable. Unnecessary exposure would have been a crime for David, as it is a crime for you.

Some people think it is a bright thing to put themselves in unnecessary peril. They like to walk up to the edge of a precipice and look off, defying vertigo, or go among contagions, when they can be of no use but to demonstrate their own bravado, or with glee drive horses which are only harnessed whirlwinds, or see how close they can walk in front of a trolley car without being crushed, or spring on a rail train after it has started, or leap off a rail train before it has stopped. Their life is a series of narrow escapes, careless of what predicament their family would suffer at their sudden taking off, or of the misfortune that might come to their business partners, or the complete failure of their life work, if a coroner's jury must be called in to decide the style of their exit. They do not take into consideration what their life is worth to others. Taken out through such recklessness, they go criminals. I warrant that you will die soon enough, without teasing and banteri casualty to see if it can launch you in the next world.

In nine cases out of ten, the fatali every day reported are not the fault engineers or brakemen or conductor cab-drivers, but of the stupidity and r lessness of people at street or rail crossing. They would like to have Chicago limited express train, with hundred passengers, and advertise arrive at a certain hour in a certain slow up to let them get two minutes er to their destination. You hav right to put your life in peril, less by such exposure something is gained for others. What imbeci thousands of Americans during our Americo-Spanish war, disappoint cause the surrender came so soo they could not have the advantag ing shot at San Juan hill, or down with the yellow fever, and on a litter to transport steamers so many floating lazarettos, in thanking God that they got no the slaughter than Tampa or Cha or the encampment at their o capital, mad at the government God, because they could not g front in time to join the four corpses, that are now being tr from the tropics to the national had been dedicated to God, was transferred to that religion which has Mohammed for its prophet. One day, centuries ago, a hundred thousand people had fled between its walls from the devastating war of the Turk, but all in vain, for Mohammed II., on horseback and followed by infuriate mobs, rode into that church, the hoofs clattering on the sacred floors, while the conqueror shouted the victory of superstition and invoked Allah, the god of Arabs and Turks, to accept the stupendous pile in dedication. What a desecration, and what world-wide despair! But that which the nations now most need is a hero, a leader, a champion, an incarnated God, to turn all the mosques of superstition and all the basilicas of sin into temples of righteousness, and to rededicate this world, so long given up to wickedness and sin, to the God who in the beginning pronounced it very good. Such a hero, such a leader, such a champion, such an incarnated God we have. He comes riding in upon the white horse of eternal victory, and we can, in more exalted sense than that which the soldiers of David felt, cry out, "Thou art worth ten thousand of us."

The world has had other conquerors, yet they subdued only a nation or a continent; but here is One who is to be a Conqueror of hemispheres. Other physicians have cured sufferings, but here is a Doctor who gave sight to those who were born blind, and without surgery straightened the crooked back, and changed the numbness of paralysis into warm circulation, and who will yet extirpate all the ailments of the world. There have been other merciful hearts all up and down through the ages, but here is One who loves us with an everlasting love, and whose mercy antedates the birth of the first mountain, and the wash of the first sea, and the radiance of the first aurora, and the chant of the morning stars at the creation, and will continue after the last rock has melted in the final conflagration, and Atlantic and Pacific oceans have rolled out of their beds, and the last night shall have folded up its shadow, and our Lord shall have cried out in the same words that sounded through the night of John's banishment on Patmos, "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last." Then all the mightiest of heaven will gather around the incarnated God of whom I preach, each one saying it for himself, but altogether uttering it in mighty chorus, "Thou Son of David, thou Son of Mary, thou Son of God, thou art worth ten thousand of us!"

But I must not close without commending to you this wonderful Christ here and now as your pardon for all sin, and your solace for all grief, and your triumph in all struggle. Down at Norfolk, Virginia, a few days ago, a gentleman was telling me of one of our war-ships in Cuban waters. Before it left a Northern harbor, some Christian ladies at much expense and with fine taste, bought and furnished for that war-vessel a pulpit, from which the chaplain might read the service and preach while on shipboard. The pulpit was made in the shape of a cross, and it was beautifully damasked and tasselled. The ship got into the battle before Santiago, and the vessels of the enemy began to sink, and their crew were struggling in the waters, when, from this ship I speak of, the officers and sailors began to throw over chairs, planks, tables, to help the drowning save themselves. After a while everything movable had been thrown overboard, except the pulpit in the shape of a cross. After objection by some that it was too beautiful and valuable to be cast into the waters, the cross was dropped into the sea. One of the drowning men seized it, but let go, and another seized, and the shout went from many on deck to those struggling in the waves, "Cling to the cross! Cling to the cross!" Several of the drowning took the advice and held on until they were rescued and brought in safety to deck, and shore, and home, and I say to all the souls today sinking in sin and sorrow, now swept this way and now that: Though the guns of temptation and disaster may splinter and knock from under you all other standing, and everything else goes down, take hold the cross and cling to it for your present and everlasting safety. Cling to the cross! for he who died upon it will save to the uttermost, and he is so good, and so lovely, and so mighty that he is worth infinitely more than ten thousand of us.

A MISSION ON ARCTIC SEAS

Dr. Grenfell's Cruises on the Gospel Ship, "Albert," Among the Labrador Fishing Fleets and the Native Eskimo

Hark! hark! I hear you, whistling shroud,
I see you, quivering mast;
The black throat of the hunted cloud
Is panting forth the blast.
An hour, and whirled like winnowing chaff,
The giant surge shall fling
Its tresses o'er you, pennon staff;
White as the sea-bird's wing.
—O. W. Holmes.

THE MISSION DOCTOR

IT is now seven years since the Royal National Mission to Deep Sea Fishermen began medical mission work along the coast of Labrador. Six years have elapsed since they sent out the Hospital Mission vessel, Albert, under the care of Dr. Grenfell. The fisher folk who remain all winter on the coast, together with some two thousand Eskimos, are cut off from civilization from December to June by the frozen sea. They are miserably poor, and in a sub-Arctic climate, frequently short of the necessaries of life. Until the advent of the Mission Hospital ship, the people every year endured much unnecessary suffering; lost limbs for want of proper medical treatment, and were thus deprived of the means of earning a livelihood for themselves or their families. Many died because of the impossibility of geting skilled assistance. Twenty-nine persons died at one harbor of diphtheria, absolutely without assistance.

DEEP SEA FISHERMEN OF LABRADOR

Subsequently two small mission hospitals were erected on the coast, 200 miles apart. A trained nurse and qualified medical missionary are maintained at each. One hospital is kept open all winter, and one doctor travels the entire coast in summer with a small steamer and in winter with an Eskimo dog-sleigh.

The northern boundary of Labrador, from Cape Webech to Cape Chudleigh, is the proper home of the Eskimos, who number about fourteen hundred. Of these one hundred are heathen, who live at the north of Ramah, the northernmost station of the Moravian Mission. There are in the interior of the country Indians who are called "mountaineers," or "hunting Indians." They once formed a great nation, and could bring into the field a thousand warriors to repel the incursions of the Eskimos, with whom they were constantly at war, and for whom they still have a bitter hatred and contempt.

Traveling in that land of snow and barrenness is a trying experience. A very long, narrow sled is drawn by six dogs, who branch out with single lines attached—the most intelligent dog being a "leader." On the sled is strapped the mother, and on her back is her babe tucked snugly into the hood of her fur jacket. The mother is dressed precisely like the father, in fur from head to foot, and unembarrassed by long dresses. The man of the family is seated in front and is whirling his long lash over the dogs who are racing at full speed. Some Moravian missionaries who have been working among the Eskimos for many years told me that every bit of thread used in the sewing of their garments was made from the seal skin, and the long skin boots were brought to perfection by the perseverance of the Eskimo women. These people have huts that are movable, and often travel with them to better quarters, to avoid the avalanches of snow and ice, or to be nearer the hunting grounds. Frequently the food supply is exhausted, and the dogs then become ravenous, and turn upon their drivers. Again, a favorite dog has been known to go to the nearest neighbor, ten miles away, in search of food, and return in time to save the life of his master.

To the noble Moravian missionaries, who have endured poverty and sacrifice unspeakable, is due the foundation of a civilized life among the Eskimos of Labrador. It was not an easy task to teach these people. The missionaries had first to acquire their language—a most difficult one. The faces of the people have a stolid expression. On the whole they are a great ethnological study. They are a musical people. In summer they board the mission ships, by whose workers the Gospel of Christ has been carried to them. Their voices, which are sweet and musical, join in the hymns, and they accompany their singing by their orchestra of no mean pretensions.

Of the present work of the hospitals established on that barren coast, and the mission and medical ships which visit them, it would be impossible to speak too highly. There is no lack of funds for carrying on the work. Her Majesty, the Queen, is a leading patron of the mission. The generosity with which the Deep Sea Mission is supported by people in England and elsewhere is shown by the enormous bales of clothing sent out to the workers for distribution among the poor, the supply being sufficient to clothe a large proportion of the people on the coast. This gratuitous distribution of clothing tends to lower the self-reliance and independence of the beneficiaries.

The whole winter population along the coast does not amount to more than three thousand, and including the Eskimo and Moravian settlements, it is probably something over four thousand. These Eskimos call themselves "Innuits," which means men. Eskimo, it is said, was a name originally given to them by the early Arctic voyagers, and means, literally, "eaters of raw flesh." The population in summer is over twenty thousand, large numbers coming from the northern bays of Newfoundland. They are a religiously inclined people, and have been accustomed, from their early days, to regular church-going. Their time on the Labrador coast is from six to twelve weeks. Many of these fishermen conduct prayers of the church and hold prayer-meetings on board their own boats; indeed, scarcely a vessel can be found on board which there is not a Bible, a prayer-book, and a hymn-book.

BATTLE HARBOR HOSPITAL

Thus it will be seen that the Deep Sea Mission do not appeal to heathen. The services of the mission workers are welcomed by the fishermen, and the doctors are a great blessing. Every coasting steamer is employed to carry mails and passengers from July 1—the commencement of the fishing season—to its close, and to carry a government doctor. The government steamer, going and coming, makes one hundred calls. The patients are taken on board and treated, and the government doctor is enabled to attend to all but the most serious cases occurring on the coast, and in these latter we have the work of the Deep Sea Mission medical steamers. The hospitals do a vast amount of gratuitous philanthropic work. The resident doctor not only attends to his particular duty, but makes occasional visits to the neighboring harbors.

A writer who has been among the fishermen, gives this interesting reminiscence of the mission's work in the earlier days:

Year in, year out, there are, in that wide expanse of troubled waters, several big fleets of fishing vessels. Each smack has eight weeks at sea, followed by eight days at home. Before the mission was started, the fisherman, even in his hour of leisure, had nothing that would enable him to escape the painful monotony of such a life. In this, certain cunning minds saw an opportunity. From one of the Dutch ports, a vessel would put out laden with liquor, usually aniseed brandy of the vilest sort. Now, to the fishermen, tobacco is almost a necessity. These vessels—copers, their captains were called—accordingly brought tobacco. They knew the men would be only too eager for it, and it was used as the bait to get them on board, so that they might be supplied with alcohol. The state of affairs that prevailed in the fleets for years, consequent upon the presence of these copers, defies description. Many lives were lost after whole crews had been drinking on these wretched vessels. Men slipped overboard getting into their boats, and were drowned; or maddened by drink, plunged into the sea, and were never seen again. With all the hands on a smack the worse for liquor, tragedies of all sorts were numerous. All this has been changed. The coper has been banished forever.

I may add that the work of the Deep Sea Fishermen's Mission is regarded by all fishermen, especially in its medical apartment, as their greatest friend! It follows faithfully the instructions and methods of the Master, who chose for some of his disciples such as these simple fishermen. They need the Divine Pilot on board their frail boats, tossing on the great sea, and He is brought very near to them all by the efforts of these consecrated workers of the Deep Sea Mission.

CHRIST AND NICODEMUS

S. S. Lesson for January 22. John 3: 1-16

Golden Text, John 3: 16

BY MRS. M. [illegible]

FROM Cana of Galilee, Jesus went to Capernaum, and thence to Jerusalem for the passover. "During the feast, many believed on his name, beholding his signs [or miracles] which he did" (John 2: 23). Thus in Jerusalem as well as in Galilee, the fame of the Lord Jesus went forth. At this time an unusual inquirer came to him, a Pharisee, who was at the same time a man of distinction, "a ruler of the Jews," named Nicodemus. The poor people and those who had been healed by him were, of course, strongly prejudiced in favor of the new Teacher, who had appeared among them as one of themselves, with no mark of superiority or assumption of authority, and whose only distinction was in the wonderful works of healing and the wonderful words of God which marked his ministry at all times.

In his own secret heart Nicodemus was convinced that this Jesus was no ordinary man: he was at least a prophet. Could he be the expected Messiah? He resolved to have a personal interview with him. But how could a man of his position pay a visit to the humble Carpenter of Nazareth without bringing down upon himself the scorn, the contempt and the ill will of all the other rulers? He determined to seek him out by night and pay him a secret visit. The Lord Jesus never refuses an inquirer under any circumstances, and he received Nicodemus, who said to him, "Rabbi, we know that thou art a Teacher come from God, for no man can do these miracles that thou doest except God be with him." "Verily, verily, I say unto thee," was the answer, "except a man be born from above [marg.], he cannot see the kingdom of God." "We know," said Nicodemus. "I say unto thee," said the Lord Jesus. Generalities in such an intensely important matter as the soul's salvation must be dropped. Every true inquirer must let God make it a personal matter. Unless it comes to "I say unto thee," nothing can be accomplished. "We know," said Nicodemus, and Jesus began by telling him what he did not know. "How can a man be born when he is old?" was his reply. "Can he enter the second time into his mother's womb and be born?" Earthly conceptions! The ruler of Israel was blind. "The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him, neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned" (I. Cor. 2: 14). "What man knoweth the things of a man save the spirit of man which is in him? Even so the things of God knoweth no man but the Spirit of God" (I. Cor. 2: 11). And Nicodemus had not the Spirit of God.

Nicodemus was out of his depth. He was ready to enter the lists with anyone in intellectual discussion, but here was a territory where intellect was nonplussed. If it were a question of doing, Nicodemus would have been at home: but here was something altogether new—it was being, and being something that one could not make oneself. All he was, all he had done, all he had learned, came short here. He did not know what it was to be born again.

How many there are who think they are all right, when, in point of fact, they are all wrong: they want to bring about in themselves, by themselves, by the resources at their command, a change which can only take place by a new creation of God. That which is born of the flesh is flesh, and flesh cannot produce spirit. It may be intellectual flesh, it may be emotional flesh, but it is not spirit. "If any man be in Christ he is a new creation: old things have passed away, behold all things are become new" (II. Cor. 5: 17, R. V.). The proof of a new birth is a new life: tastes and dispositions no longer after the flesh, but after the spirit, no longer pleasing self, glorifying self, depending upon self, but pleasing, glorifying and depending upon God. No outward reformation can bring this about, no outward religious practices, no mental apprehension of truth. The birth of "Christ in you, the hope of glory" (Col. 1: 27) takes place in "the hidden man of the heart" (I. Peter 3: 4).

"How can these things be?" is the question of every honest inquirer, and Jesus answered Nicodemus, "Art thou the teacher of Israel and understandest not these things?" (R. V.) Just as later he said to his disciples regarding the parable of the sower. "Know ye not this parable? How then will ye know all parables?" These are the rudimentary things, the first principles of the life of Christ. Without these we have no eyes to see either the Kingdom of God or the King. "Verily, verily, we speak that we do know, and testify that we have seen (the characteristics of true witnesses), and ye (rulers) receive not our witness. If I have told ye earthly things and ye believe not, how shall ye believe if I tell you of heavenly things?"

"We speak that we do know." Our Lord unites himself with every witness of the new birth. Speaking to Nicodemus he says, "Thou hearest the sound" of the wind when it blows, and so thou canst perceive the presence of the spirit in a man who is born in the spirit. Thou knowest he is not an ordinary man: but thou knowest no more of how he became so than of whence the wind cometh and whither it goest. But we do know, we have seen. God has revealed these things by his Spirit, for the Spirit searcheth all things, yea, the deep things of God (I. Cor. 2: 10). "And no man has ascended up to heaven, but he that came down from heaven, even the Son of Man which is in heaven." More than ever was Nicodemus out of his depth. What, could the Son of Man be talking with him on earth by night, and yet be the Eternal Son, one with his Father in heaven at the same time? Yet thus it was.

And now our Lord begins to put down the ladder of truth low enough for any sinner to step out upon it. It is the lesson of the Cross, the beginning of all things for the sinner, even if he be a teacher. "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish but have everlasting life." Here then is the way to be born again. The serpent's deadly bite has poisoned the blood of every living man: all have sinned and come short of the glory of God: all we, like sheep, have gone astray, we have turned every one to his own way (Isa. 53: 6). That which is born of the flesh is not only flesh, but corrupt flesh, poisoned flesh, condemned flesh. But a life message comes from our gracious, merciful God: and as Moses put the brazen serpent on a pole that every death-stricken Israelite might look and live, so has God in his unspeakable grace sent his Son to hang upon the cross, and he had "laid on him the iniquity of us all" (Isa. 53: 6).

He that believeth, in the very doing so, receives spiritual life. How it comes or whither it goes, no man knoweth. But thousands upon thousands can testify, "I [illegible] and I have everlasting life." How the life-power came into the man [illegible] to him, "Stretch forth thine hand," and, believing that Jesus was not mocking him, he did the impossible—who can tell? The fact was there, but how life came, God only knows. The condition is clear enough repeated again and again. It is believing, reckoning on God, that he will be true to his Word. In this our own will is our part, the Spirit of God is the enabling power which works with our will.

LESSON POINTS

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers

HOW much we are indebted to John for the report of this conversation between Christ and Nicodemus, which he alone gives! It is the whole Gospel condensed into a few words. The conversation may have occurred at John's house: in any case, he appears to have been present. The word "we," in the eleventh verse, suggests the presence of one or more of the disciples. Christ appears to have read the thoughts of Nicodemus, and to have replied to them, rather than to his words. He perceived that there were three misconceptions in the mind of his visitor, which he proceeded to remove. As these errors prevail at the present time, Christ's statements are of vital interest to us. The first related to Christ himself. Nicodemus greeted him as a teacher, and referred to his miracles. But it was not as a teacher or as a miracle-worker that Christ came. His object was to impart life. The second error was as to the nature of the kingdom. It was not to be the material, earthly kingdom that Nicodemus and other Jews were expecting, but a spiritual kingdom exclusively for spiritual men. And the third error was as to the qualifications for membership in it. They were not birth, or parentage, or education, but a change of nature so radical that it was equivalent to a new birth. Astonishing as all this appears to have been to Nicodemus, a still greater surprise was conveyed in the intimation that he, and such as he, must undergo that change before they could see the kingdom of God. In spite of his quibble, there is no doubt that Nicodemus knew what Christ meant. The very phrase Christ used was familiar to the Jews of the capacity for a higher life. It crawls into its cocoon, and in a few days, its skin is split, and out of it comes the butterfly, which ranges at will over the garden. It has had a new birth into a new life.

FROM AN OLD PAINTING

THE INTERVIEW BETWEEN CHRIST AND NICODEMUS

admitted to Judaism, as being born again. The difficulty with Nicodemus was [illegible] must be born again to become a Jew, so the Jew must be born again before he could see the kingdom of God. There was need for the pardon and cleansing symbolized by the water and for the inspiration and power imparted by the Spirit. The lesson has still to be learned. Men cannot become Christians as they become Republicans, or Democrats, by adopting a certain set of principles, nor by education nor development. There must be a change of heart, which the Holy Spirit is ready and willing to effect.

Born of the Spirit. Carlyle's interpretation of Goethe's parable of the fisherman's hut, is an illustration of the transforming power of the Holy Spirit. There was a lamp placed in the hut, the light of which illuminated the bare boards and made them look like silver. Gradually under the light the boards changed their nature and were transformed from within to without into solid silver. And then the hut grew taller. It lost its squalid proportions and assumed a graceful shape, and rearing its head toward heaven was turned from a hut into a beautiful temple. So the man whose heart the Holy Spirit enters becomes a temple of the Lord.

Except a man be born again. This is a spiritual mystery, but there is an analogy in nature that may help to an understanding of it. If the caterpillar that crawls from leaf to leaf could speak, it would tell us that it knows nothing of the beauty of the world. It has no life beyond the leaves of the tree on which it feeds. But we know that it has within it the capacity for a higher life. It crawls into its cocoon, and in a few days, its skin is split, and out of it comes the butterfly, which ranges at will over the garden. It has had a new birth into a new life.

That which is born of flesh. All life has its limitations. As Professor Drummond pointed out, lower life can rise into higher life only by life imparted. The stone cannot grow into a plant. The mineral kingdom cannot produce the vegetable, unless vegetable seed is received into it. "The living soul," as Paul described our great progenitor, must wait for spiritual life, until the appearance of "the quickening spirit."

The serpent in the wilderness. The reference is to the events described in Numbers 21: 5-9. The serpent-bitten Israelite had to look to the brazen serpent, thereby proving his faith in the remedy. So the sin-cursed human race must look to Christ for relief and cure for the universal malady. A famous writer tells the story of a young physician who settled in a large town. He had made a special study of fevers, and treated them on what was then a new principle—strengthening the system instead of bleeding. The chief physician of the town laughed the new system to scorn, and argued learnedly to prove that it was wrong. But the young doctor cured his patients, in spite of his opponent's arguments. The old physician himself fell ill with a fever, and as it grew worse and his life was in danger, his friends besought him to call in his rival. After a time he reluctantly yielded, and allowed his daughter to go for him. But the young physician would not come. "I could do him no good," he said. "He does not believe in my methods. If he summons me himself, I will go." The sufferer realizing that his case was desperate, wrote a note asking his rival's help, and he came at once. He asked: "Will you pledge yourself to follow my directions implicitly and not apply leaches, or do anything of yourself? Will you trust your case to me?" The patient promised. "Then," said the young physician, "I can cure you." And he did.

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE

WINTER IN FLOWER-LAND

Flowers of the Golden State — Seasons of Southern California — The National Flower

SPRING is well under way in Southern California, where they have but two seasons—summer, lasting from April to November, and spring, from November to April. In the summer, or dry season, hills, mesas, and valleys are often brown and bare, save for the green of live oak, peppers and eucalipti. After the first few rains, the earth begins to don her spring array of bud and blossom. "Baby-blue-eyes," a dear little blossom, whose name describes it, is one of spring's first heralds, and is followed hard and fast by a beautiful and bewildering procession of primroses, larkspur, morning-glories, violets, mountain lilacs, pansies, roses, asters, and flowers without number that are strangers to us "back East," as our California friends describe our locality. While we are wrapped in cloaks, overcoats and furs, and our lakes and rivers are full of ice, they are sitting in the open air, watching the flowers bloom; and the housewife is gathering fruit and vegetables for her table from garden and orchard. "Everywhere else," writes a dweller in southern California, "flowers die in autumn, plant-life rests in winter; but in this land of contrarities, vegetation starts in winter and rests in summer. Nature has her Easter morning at New Year." A native poet begins a midwinter carol thus:

Winter! and the air is as fragrant as roses,
Or as spring with wild sweets on the hill;
As warm as when summer reposes,
At eve, and the wind is still.

Exotics, which we raise here at any time only under glass, glorify lonely foothills or untrodden plains. A little chat about some of the more than 2,000 flowering plants which our sister State on the Pacific produces, will be interesting to our readers, many of whom love flowers so that they give much time and care to the little window-garden which is such a delight to home folks and guests. There is the "Candle of the Lord," or "bayonet plant," as we call it here. Its stalk, rising fifteen feet high, from a cluster of great, bayonet-shaped green leaves, bears as many as 2,000 flowers, "fairy-bells of white," fragrant as orange blooms.

The "Candle of the Lord" thrives best on deserts or bare mountain sides. The wild mustard is like that of the Scriptures, "in the branches of which the birds of the air may nest." Readers of Ramona will recall how eloquently the author speaks of this plant, whose shoot, so slender that dozens can find starting-point in an inch, runs up straight ten, twenty feet, and then sends out a multitude of fine feathery branches, interlocking with those of their neighbors; this lacelike mass bursts into yellow bloom, more feathery and lacelike. "With a clear blue sky behind it, it looks like a golden snowstorm." For all its beauty, it is a trial in the flesh to the farmer. The California State flower—the golden poppy, with its "cup of finest gold," and which "broiders valleys and foot-hills until they look like a 'field of cloth of gold'"—was well chosen.

Sun and star did sow down in the fields below;
Up the gold did burn and in its turn,
Matched earth with heaven's glory. The story
Of our poppy's told—our blossom of the gold.

California boasts 500 members of the aster family, to which belong the homely sunflowers, daisies, and thistles, that are common United States properties; and also the royal chrysanthemum — the "Christ flower"—which grows nowhere in more gracious luxuriance than in the Golden State. Our picture of a typical California scene shows a walk, bordered with chrysanthemums in abundant bloom at a season, when, if we have them, we must pay from ten to twenty-five cents for a single flower at a florist's stand. But nature's favors are evenly distributed. Presently, when our trailing arbutus shall be telling us that spring is here, Southern California's flowers will be going into their summer sleep to be awakened when spring comes to them next winter.

Portugal's Queen a Doctor

Amelie, wife of Portugal's king, studied medicine and won the degree of M.D. in the University at Lisbon, working in the hospitals and taking her course in the most democratic manner. She did this, because of her husband's ill-health, and because she felt that no one would give even a king the attention that a wife would. Her Majesty has practiced her profession in various emergency cases and among the poor. She is also an artist in bonnet-making, and one day, while out driving, she saw a crowd surrounding a girl who had fainted, stopped her carriage, gave the girl professional attention, had her brought to the palace, inquired into her history, and found that she was a milliner out of employment and with an invalid mother to support. What does Her Majesty do but make three bonnets and hand them to the milliner, saying, "Take these models, call them 'bonnets Amelie,' and tell your customers you can make bonnets after the queen's own fashioning." The milliner found ready custom, and is to-day the employer of over two hundred women.

A MIDWINTER WALK IN CALIFORNIA

The Chinese Baby's Nap

In China, when baby goes to sleep, people think its soul has gone out for a walk. If it sleeps long, its mamma is alarmed, fearing that baby's soul has wandered too far away and cannot find its way home. If it does not come back, of course the baby will never waken. Sometimes men are sent out on the street to call the baby's name over and over again, as though it were a real child lost. They hope to lead the soul back home. If a baby sleeps while it is being carried from one place to another, the danger of losing the soul along the way is very great. So, whoever carries the little one keeps saying its name out loud, so that the soul will not stray away. They think of the soul as a bird hopping after them.

The Hindu Girl and Marriage

It is strange to our Occidental notions to read that in India, the land of child-marriages (where little girls of six or eight years, or even of as many months, are brides), that marriage is suggested to little girls as soon as they know anything, and is associated in their minds with plenty of sweet-meats, fire-works, gorgeous dresses, and a ride on a horse or in a palanquin in an evening procession. We remember once, says a writer in the Bombay Guardian, a Hindu friend called on us, and took our little girl upon his knee. He wanted to say something to her suitable for a child, and he said the first thing he would naturally have said to a little Hindu girl. He asked in a laughing way, "Well, when are you going to get married?" Our little maid looked at him with great wondering eyes, and soon forgot the query, but we never did, and many a time as we tucked her in her bed at night, or watched her eager enthusiasm over her studies, or watched her guardianship over her brother, or felt her loving care that saved us some burden, have we thanked God that no iron custom had power to take her from our sheltering love and care, until she was able to stand alone, or choose for herself.

Women in Japan

Perhaps nothing indicates more clearly the rapid advance of Japan than the establishment at Tokio of a university for the higher education of women, under the substantial patronage of the Emperor and Empress, and the Japanese Court. When Commodore Perry opened the ports of Japan to the world, its women were practically slaves. Now, even the masses are becoming permeated with the Christian ideal of womanhood; Japanese home-life is responding to its influence. No nation can boast such rapid elevation of its women as Japan, since it came in touch with Christian civilization.

MY CASTLE

YOU may tell in glowing language of your grand ancestral halls,
Where the glint of golden sunshine in its splendor ever falls;
And recite to me the story of the greatness of your clan
They who wore the royal purple better else than any man
But your story will not turn me from the visions of my youth;
Gilded falsehood cannot tempt me from the path of righteous truth.
Rather than your storied towers, O, I would that you might see
My childhood's charming castle—home, sweet home, at mother's knee.

There I knelt beside my mother in the twilight's solemn hour,
As the vesper bells were tinkling from the village church's tower,
And repeated as she told me, "Now I lay me down to sleep;"
Softly then we'd say together, "I pray the Lord my soul to keep."
Then with that fond love that mothers are the only ones who know,
Gently she would take and rock me in her dear arms, to and fro.
No, the castle in your story could not be a home to me,
When compared with childhood's castle—home, sweet home, at mother's knee.

Mother's love is not forgotten tho' her counsels are denied;
Tho' I follow not the pathway that she taught me at her side.
Mother's kiss upon my forehead would alleviate all pain,
And the sun would shed its radiance over all the world again.
In her arms I found a refuge from the dangers of the day,
And I would that she were with me now to brush my cares away.
All the gifts that I might offer I would gladly give to be Once more the happy-hearted boy I was at mother's knee. —L. A. EWING.

Peace in the Home

"BLESSED are the peacemakers, for they shall be called the children of God." Father and mother must be beautiful and undivided in their lives if they want their children to dwell together harmoniously. It is not an easy thing for even the most excellent people to live together in harmony, if they have clashing tastes and temperaments, but when differences are overcome they are means of grace, and some of the most beautiful married lives in all the world are the result of unions of so-called "incompatibles" who took their troubles to God. In Stepping Heavenward, the author says she and her husband began, and kept up their married lives by saying together every evening a little prayer that they might love each other better and be kinder to each other day by day. Troubles came, and differences came that might have grown serious but for the little evening prayer. At a good old age the couple were happy and lovers still. A part of every child's evening and morning prayer should be the petition for a loving spirit, for the love that "believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things." In the interests of peace—and of even better things than peace—several very simple rules need to be impressed on the growing members of the family circle. Here are a few Don'ts: Don't tell tales; don't criticise behind each others' backs; keep engagements and pay your debts as punctually in the family circle as among outsiders; be as prompt and pleasant at meal times as possible; don't nag; don't lose your temper. Remember that a temper is an excellent thing—to keep. A great many placid people have the fatal gift of ruffling everybody else. Remember that virtue consists not merely in being good yourself, but in helping others to be good also. Like the Ten Commandments, the whole matter can be summed up in St. Paul's oft-repeated words: "Love is the fulfilling of the law."

A Queer Traveling Companion

A Western paper tells of a little lass of eleven who traveled from Wichita, Kan., to Rochester, N. Y., with no companion but her kitten. It is against railroad rules to admit cats to passenger coaches, but kitty and her mistress were so well mannered that they won right of way. So much for raising kittens up in the way in which they should go!

The Mormons and Congress

NATIONAL attention, at the present moment, is riveted upon the issues of a controversy over the admission of a confessed polygamist to a seat in the House of Representatives. Mr. Roberts, the candidate in question, makes an open fight and descends to no subterfuges or denials. He avows his Mormon principles openly, admits that he is living in polygamy, and bids defiance to statutes and morals. He declares the Edmunds Act a preventive rather than a repressive measure, dealing with new offenders only, and he asserts that there is nothing in the Constitution of the State of Utah, or the acts of its legislature, that affect his own case, or the thousands of similar cases existing in Utah at the present time.

If his contention be sustained, the efforts of our National Legislature to suppress polygamy, and the conditions imposed on Utah upon which its admission to the sisterhood of States depended, were absolutely futile and worthless as legislative remedies. But we cannot believe that Congress will take this view of the matter. It has within its own hands the power to accept or reject such a candidate, and it may base its action, if it chooses, on the ground that the self-acknowledged representative and champion of a cause which has incurred the obloquy of national condemnation, should not be permitted to share in the deliberations of our nation's law-makers.

Mr. Roberts is a type of the true Mormon polygamist. His admission would mean letting down the bars of public morality and giving the highest official sanction and approval to a system which is a foul offense in the eyes of the American people—a system which has been responsible in the past for innumerable nameless sins, and for some of the darkest tragedies in our history. Founded in fraud, imposture and deceit, Mormonism has only been held in check by the severest measures and incessant vigilance. Yet, in spite of all, its emissaries are to-day spreading their doctrines of lust and license in our towns and villages in many States, and homes and churches have been invaded, to their everlasting sorrow and ruin. It is a system to which all who love honor, purity, the dignity of womanhood and the integrity of the home, are unalterably opposed, and which nothing could ever induce them to tolerate or condone. It is a noxious relic of barbarism, which should be rooted out of the soil of our civilized and progressive land, or at all events, rendered impotent for further evil and incapable of further growth.

This is what the country expects and has a right to demand of Congress: That it should exercise its prerogative by emphatically declining to receive an avowed polygamist as a member of the House of Representatives, and a fit person to make laws for the nation; and also that it go a step further, and record its unqualified condemnation of the Mormon system as a whole. For the case of Mr. Roberts, as an individual, we care nothing. He may be a man of the highest talents and eminently qualified for public office. His election may or may not be legal. His claim to a seat may be valid, regarded from the usual political standpoint. It is enough that he brings into the honored halls of Congress the vile stain of polygamy, and that he glories in a thing which every true citizen regards with loathing and disgust. The honor of American manhood, the dignity and purity of American womanhood are assailed, and these we look confidently to Congress to preserve and defend, by every means within its power.

A Good Day

WE ought to rise in the morning rested; and in the vast majority of cases we shall find a good day beginning at six or seven o'clock. Further, a good day begins with God. A wise merchant would no more think of going to business without communion with Christ, than of going to the store without coat, or hat, or shoes. We used to have a very poor watch, and we had to set it every morning in order that we might make from it a guess about the time of day. Our souls are poor timepieces, utterly disordered; and every morning we need to set them by the Sun of Righteousness. Before we start off to the shop we need to pray for patience. We shall be harassed and perplexed; men will wrong us and impose upon us, and cheat us; and before the day is past, if you have not laid in a large supply of patience, you will half swear with your lips, and perhaps make a whole swear with your hearts.

You need to pray in the morning for help in business. If you want money, ask for it. God's hand is on all business affairs. He controls the machinations of all gamblers. You will not make a dollar unless God wills that you make it; or lose it unless God wills that you lose it. If you want success in worldly matters, at the throne of grace every morning ask for it.

That is a good day on which you make some one happy. It is astonishing how little it takes to make one happy. Feel that the day is wasted in which you have not succeeded in this. Never put upon any one an unnecessary burden. Never tell a man what mean things you have heard of him. If you find in a newspaper an unpleasant paragraph in regard to him, do not cut it out and send it to him by post. Do not write him a valentine. About the best man in the world we could rake up in society enough unpleasant things to make him supremely miserable.

Further, a good day ends with God. You will at the close of the day find that you have made many mistakes, said things you ought not to have said, and done things you ought not to have done. Confess it frankly in your prayer to God. Say: "O Lord, forgive me that I got angry with that customer!" "Forgive me that I lied just a little about those goods!" "Forgive me for kicking that beggar so roughly out of the shop!" Go to bed at peace with all the world. Soothe your feelings for slumber by a snatch of Christian song. And in eternity, you will look back and think of some day in your life begun in prayer, conducted in usefulness, and ended in thanksgiving, and you shall record that it was a good day.

The Happiness of Having a Hobby

EVERY one has a dormant hobby, which only needs cultivating; and if we consult our habits and tastes, we shall be led without a mistake to this essential condiment of every-day happiness. In the [illegible] we must [illegible] and [illegible] are very interesting things. A person is crotchety, when so much under the dominion of one idea, that their judgment is impaired by their partial, or one-sided views of a subject. A crotchet is a creature of the brain, which [illegible] understanding. A hobby, from its lowest point of view, means pure gain of some innocent pleasure. A crotchet is always mischievous. A hobby is beneficial, for it gives zest to that portion of life which is not spent in work or sleep, or in personal attentions; in fact a good hobby may be the informing spirit of nearly a third part of our existence.

Yet a legitimate hobby never interferes with the business or duties of life; indeed it generally runs in an absolutely contrary direction. Mr. Trollope's rich breeches-maker's hobby was to ally himself with the aristocracy through his daughter; but this did not prevent him from measuring his noble customers [illegible] stantly protested against this service. A hobby then, as regards business, should be strictly some pursuit which accompanies, but does not supercede the work of life. It must own its suzerainty, and be content with the remnants of time, which actual duty permits.

The difference is easily illustrated. Music is Sousa's business; but music may be our hobby. Military tactics are General Miles' business; but how many thousands of militiamen have taken to shouldering arms in the pure spirit of a hobby? Not any doubt of their patriotism is implied; but when men, in their leisure hours, speak and write and read about nothing but battalion drill, we may be very sure that they find in it that satisfaction which supplements business; and which, without the least disrespect, may be called a hobby. Again, literature is Kipling's and Howell's business; but a large majority of people make a very delightful hobby out of writing a book. The book may never be published—perhaps it is better it should never be published—but if in any single case it has concentrated all the spare energies of a man or woman, and gathered together the waifs and strays of their experience, and so given purpose and interest to their hours of leisure, it has answered one of the best purposes of a hobby. Only this fact is to be kept in mind: That the profession or business or service, which constitutes our daily labor for daily bread, is our chief work; and our hobby—whatever it may be—is our off-work.

Leisure hours, both spiritually, mentally and physically, are very important hours. If we do not find a good, sensible, or an innocent hobby to fill them, we know who is credited with finding thoughts for the vacant head, and work for the idle hand. Leisure is a debatable land, liable to be invaded from many points. Generally speaking, we fall in one of two extremes—restlessness, or stagnation. Perhaps no people have a greater respect for summer leisure than we have; and none know less how to use it. Either we permit our minds and bodies to lie fallow, and soon find the want of work insufferably tedious; or we go rushing from one point of the compass to the other, without any special interest, or available object. So we gain nothing, and we attain nothing, and return home with such a sense of our failure to compass happiness and rest that we are irritable and fretted over our inabilities. A hobby followed out with intelligence and tenacity would have filled every hour with pleasure, and brought us back to work, healthy and cheerful. For there is this peculiar satisfaction in a hobby—it goes with us, wherever we go, and its presence enables us to defy ennui; for when we are accompanied by our hobbies, we are not easily dissatisfied; we carry with us one of the secrets of happiness.

Some people would be utterly despicable, but for their hobbies. In their business life they know nothing but the mere accumulation of gold; but their hobby saves them from entire contempt. One man of this kind had a taste for landscape gardening, and in this labor of love he tried to cultivate his stupid brain. He read volumes on the science and history of the art; and if he knows anything worth knowing, he owes it to his hobby. It is remarkable in this connection that people of an obstinate dictatorial temper generally choose some hobby which brings them only into relationship with inert matter, or else with matter that is easily subordinated. In gardening, a man can tyrannize at will. If he objects to a flower or a plant, he can tear it up by the roots. He can dictate as to their locality, and they must live there to please him, or die to [illegible] If a [illegible] of a tree of [illegible] his eyes he can [illegible] it. Nothing resists him. He can do his very worst, if desperate things generally, [illegible] at two very best among the [illegible] and [illegible] Happy, and in this department really clever. One of the secrets of our natural liking for hobbies is that our hobby is [illegible] to be well-read and strong; and we respect knowledge and strength, and are aware that [illegible]

Blessed are they who, when they grow past the working hours of life, have the leisure for many little hobbies, and can give to each of them that delightful holiday character, which is their true atmosphere. Such men and women will be "well-to-do" in soul, and mind, and body. And if these hobbies be commensurate with their highest faculties, and look to the noblest possible purpose—that is, making happiness through the happiness of [illegible] They fulfil the [illegible] Himself.

It is difficult, then, to say how much happiness a hobby confers. For a hobby is not a lump of happiness that is defineable and measureable; it is rather a little current of enjoyment, flowing through many delicate channels, flavoring all our days, taking our thoughts in the sunshine, warming our feelings, and giving to us the sense of recreation and play-time, even in old age, and until our eternal youth begins.

Rev. Thomas Harrison will begin a ten-days' revival work at the Market Street M. E. Church, Paterson, N. J., on January 11. Rev. D. R. Lowrie, D. D., is the pastor. A great spiritual outpouring [illegible]

The death is announced of Mr. J. H. Mills, [illegible] Carolina. Mr. Mills was known and honored throughout the State as "The Orphans' Friend," a title any man might be proud to wear.

[illegible] sity. Dr. Merrill is a graduate of Harvard, and is fifty-two years of age. He is the author of the famous work on the manuscripts of the Bible.

The plan projected for a Naval Young Men's Christian Association has been approved by the Secretary of the Navy, and Commander Philip has been elected to supervise the Army and Navy Department of the Young Men's Christian Association [illegible]

W. S. Caine, M. P., an English authority on life insurance, recently stated publicly that the records of the life insurance companies showed that on the average a total abstainer might be expected to live nine years longer than a man who habitually used intoxicating liquors.

The American Institute for Spanish girls which was formerly located at San Sebastian but on the outbreak of the war was removed to Biarritz, France, will now it is hoped, be established in Madrid. An appeal has been issued to American Christians for funds to defray the cost of necessary buildings.

Mr. Robert R. McBurney, General Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. of New York, is dead. His loss is severely felt. He had been secretary for thirty-six years, and during that time had given his time and talent and labor unreservedly to the cause. Many associations in other cities have benefited by his advice and encouraging words.

The International Committee of Young Men's Christian Associations has issued a call from its Student Department for a universal day of prayer for students. The day appointed is the second Sunday of February, which was the day adopted by the World's Student Christian Federation. The same day is now observed in all Christian countries.

An interesting addition was made to the First Presbyterian Church of Lawrenceburgh, Ind., on December 25. Among the new members to whom the pastor, Rev. Mr. Shirey, gave the right hand of fellowship was a whole family, consisting of father, mother and their four children, who all joined the church at the same time on confession of faith.

Mr. B. C. Randall, the agent of the British and Foreign Bible Society, who has commenced work in Manila in the Philippine Islands, has received a cordial welcome from the United States Consul. The first day he sold twenty Bibles, seventeen Testaments and forty-five Gospel portions. On another day he sold fifty-six Testaments. All these of course, were in Spanish. He describes the people as densely ignorant, but eager for teaching.

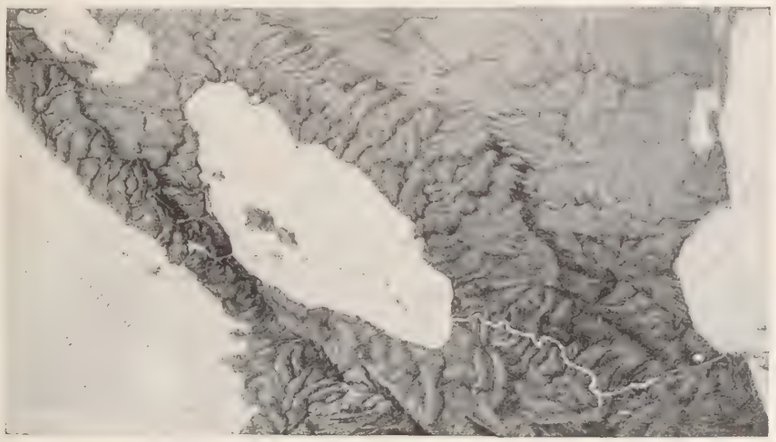
The first number of The New Africa, Bishop Hartzell's new monthly magazine, published in the interest of the Methodist Missions in Africa, has just been issued. It is a handsome 32 page publication, well illustrated, and replete with interesting information concerning the advancement of Christ's kingdom in the Dark Continent. After the present number, it will be set up, printed and issued at Monrovia, the Liberian capital, all the mechanical work being done by negroes. Every one who will send to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a contribution of $1 or more for Bishop Hartzell's African Gospel work will receive [illegible] of the same, and will also receive a free mail subscription to The New Africa during the year 1899, according to the Bishop's promise, which appeared in a recent issue of this journal.

THE NICARAGUAN CANAL

FROM the Nicaraguan Canal Commission, of which Admiral Walker is Chairman, comes a preliminary report of a most encouraging character. The Commission has examined all three of the routes proposed and pronounces all of them feasible of construction. The low level route, which Admiral Walker deems the most expensive, would, in his opinion, cost not more than one hundred and twenty-four million dollars. The Commission has not yet had time to prepare a complete report, but it is nearly finished, and will be submitted to the Senate Committee at an early date. The physical difficulties in the way of the work are thus shown to be surmountable, and the pessimist view of it must so far be abandoned. There are, however, the financial difficulties and the obstacles of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, under which the United States are pledged not to undertake the enterprise, still to be dealt with. But both of these will, it is believed, be overcome. The advantages which will be derived both by the Atlantic and Pacific States by piercing the isthmus between North and South America are so obvious that it is marvelous that it was not done long ago. A glance at the map shows how much time and expense would be saved if it were possible for a ship on its way from New York to San Francisco to pass through the isthmus, instead of going around Cape Horn. The distance traveled would be reduced from 13,099 miles to 5,005. A voyage from New York to Yokohama, Japan, would be reduced from 13,040 miles to 9,915. Our illustrations show the route which is most likely to be adopted, and a scene in the town of Managua, the capital of Nicaragua. The project has many advantages over that commenced in 1881 by M. Lesseps, the famous French engineer, who constructed the Suez Canal. Although the isthmus is narrower at the point where he began work, it has not there the advantage of the great lake which, on the Nicaraguan route, relieves the engineers of a great part of their work. Besides this, the climate on the Nicaraguan route is healthy, while that of Panama proved fatal to the workers. It remains now to be seen whether Congress will take up the project, which, in view of our acquisition of the Hawaiian Islands and the Philippines, is of the utmost importance. It will be a pity if party disputes or political jealousies should delay the necessary legislation. One might use to politicians who, from unworthy motives, obstruct the progress of the needed improvement, the words that the prophet addressed to the stubborn among his people:

Cast ye up, cast ye up, prepare the way, take up the stumbling-block out of the way of my people (Isaiah 57:14).

REAR-ADMIRAL WALKER, U.S.N.



MAP OF THE ROUTE OF THE NICARAGUA CANAL

An Irregular Call

A curious instance of humanity restricted by red tape, is reported by the New York Sun. Four men were returning in a carriage from a public meeting, which had been protracted till midnight. In crossing Sixth Avenue the carriage was struck by a southbound electric car. The men inside the carriage escaped with a few bruises and a severe shaking, but the shock threw the driver from his seat. His left leg was broken by the fall and he was badly cut on the head. One of the men in the carriage hurried to the nearest public telephone station and called up a hospital. He stated what the accident was and asked that an ambulance be sent for the injured driver, who was then lying on a snow-bank on the sidewalk. The night-clerk of the hospital replied that it was a rule of the hospital to send an ambulance only at the request of a policeman. As the case was urgent, and there was no policeman at hand, the man pleaded for the rule to be relaxed in this case, but the clerk refused. Happily a doctor was found, who gave the injured man temporary attention and he was sent to his home for treatment. The Superintendent of the hospital admitted that there was such a rule as the clerk had quoted, but he said that employees were expected to use their common-sense and not allow a rule to obstruct humane action. Other people beside hospital employees need a caution of the same kind. Too many are unwilling to recognize the brotherhood of those who are not endorsed by their own denomination.

We forbade him because he followeth not with us; but Jesus said Forbid him not, for he that is not against us is for us (Luke 9:49).

A Father's Embarrassment

One of the most painful positions in which a father could be placed, is described in a press despatch from Hartford, Conn. It reports that among the prisoners recently brought to the State prison, was the son of the warden. The young man had formerly been his father's clerk, and had been employed in keeping the prison accounts. While serving in that capacity, he had raised the amount on several checks, and kept the difference between the sums for which the checks were originally drawn, and the sums to which he raised them. He was detected and sentenced to four years' imprisonment. As he entered the gates of the prison with the other prisoners, he looked anxiously into his father's face, but the father who, as warden, was waiting to receive the prisoners, did not show that he recognized his son. To him the young man was only one of the prisoners committed to his custody. With the customary signal of a wave of his hand, the warden turned the file of handcuffed men over to the deputy, who led them away to shave and bathe them and measure them by the Bertillon system. Within an hour the young man was learning the lock-step with the other prisoners. It is said that he is bitterly disappointed. His father had been a loving and indulgent parent, and the son had unbounded faith in the continuance of his affection. He forgot that his crime had placed him in a new relation to his father, whose duty to the State required him to treat him as a convict and not as a son. There is reason to fear that many people are cherishing similar hopes as to their eternal future. While it is true that God is love, it should not be forgotten that he is also just:

Then shall ye begin to say, We have eaten and drunk in thy presence and thou hast taught in our streets. But he shall say, I tell you I know not whence ye are; depart from me all ye workers of iniquity (Luke 13:26).

Collision with a Lighthouse

The Captain of the steamer Strathard, which arrived at Philadelphia a few days ago, told a reporter of the Times of that city, a strange story of misadventure. He had come from the east, and had passed through the Suez canal on his way home. It was in the darkness before dawn, that he entered the canal. As he reached Bitter Lakes, a sheet of water about sixteen miles from the southern entrance, he was surprised to see the lighthouse in the far distance, apparently ten miles away. Knowing that the channel at that point was less than five miles wide, he realized that the light must be much nearer than it appeared. He attributed the delusion to the well-known refraction of the atmosphere, which in those regions, produces the mirage. He asked the pilot how far off the light was, and the reply was "About three miles." As he spoke, the man on watch struck three bells. The strong vibration seemed to produce a quiver in the air and instantly the light which had appeared to be so far away shone at its true distance—less than two hundred feet away. It was impossible to stop the ship in time to avert a collision. She went head on and struck the lighthouse with a crash. Fortunately the speed, in accordance with the canal regulations, was slow, otherwise she must have foundered. As it was, she had five feet of water in her fore-peak when she reached Port Said, where she had to stay for repairs before the voyage could be continued. It was singular that the vessel should have collided with the very edifice that was set for a warning. Analogous catastrophes occur in the spiritual world. Many a man has wrecked his whole future for this world and the next by attacking the Bible which God gave as a guide and a beacon to the world.

Whosoever shall fall upon that stone shall be broken; but on whomsoever it shall fall it will grind him to powder (Luke 20:18).

SCENE IN MANAGUA, THE CAPITAL OF NICARAGUA

Crazy Self-mutilation

A shocking act of a demented woman is reported from Paterson, N. J. For some weeks past, the neighbors of a woman living in that town have noticed that she was acting and talking strangely. She had been deeply grieved by the death of her daughter, which occurred last summer, and she never recovered the shock it gave her. To any one who would listen to her she would talk mournfully of her lost child, and bemoan the cruel fate which had despoiled her home. Her grief preyed on her mind until it became unbalanced, and she would rave distractedly for hours and then sink into gloom. One morning last week she was in one of her melancholy moods when her husband left to go to his work. About an hour later a neighbor went to her home and found her bleeding profusely from the mouth. She ran out and gave an alarm, and an ambulance was called. The doctor found that she had cut nearly an inch off the end of her tongue. At the hospital she gave conflicting accounts of the cause of her injury, but the neighbors say that she inflicted it herself, because she thought that she talked too much. There are many persons who are sadly conscious of that fault, but only one who is demented would think of applying so heroic a remedy. If the poor crazed creature had possessed reason she might have perceived that there was no need for self-mutilation to correct her fault while the power exists to which the Psalmist appealed:

Set a watch O Lord before my mouth; keep the door of my lips (Ps. 141:3).

An Alleged Leper

By a decision of a Grand Jury of Pennsylvania reported by the New York Herald, a man is to be released from solitary confinement. He has been kept secluded for seven years under the belief that he was a leper. When he was first taken ill he went to a country doctor who was unable to diagnose his case. He saw other doctors and finally a consultation was held at which the decision was reached that he was suffering from leprosy. The town officials being notified of the fact, sent him to Lima, Pa., where a hut was erected for him in the centre of a field. A few articles of furniture were placed in it and a trough stood outside, in which, at regular intervals his food was put by an attendant from the poor-house. Fuel was also supplied as he needed it. There the man has remained for seven years, seldom seeing the face of man, and holding no communication with the outside world. It is now discovered that he is not, and never was, a leper. He is to be set at liberty, but he does not appreciate his good fortune. The seven years of isolation have left him a wreck in mind and body, more like an animal than a man. And the saddest feature of his case is that his suffering was unnecessary. His disease was not contagious, but as the opinion of the doctors was that it was, he was secluded lest others might contract it. It would be well if like care was exercised to keep the malady of sin from spreading, for, as we are warned by the wise king, it is contagious.

Enter not into the path of the wicked, and go not into the way of evil men. Avoid it, pass not by it, turn from it, and pass away (Prov. 4:14).

"A BEAUTIFUL POSSIBILITY"

A New and Charming Serial Story, Written Exclusively for "The Christian Herald"

BY EDITH FERGUSON BLACK

ONE night Judge Hildreth sat in his library far into the small hours. He was reading for the twentieth time the letter from his dead brother which Evadne had placed in his hands on the evening of her arrival, and as he read he frowned.

"It is ridiculous—absurd!" he exclaimed impatiently. "Just of a piece with all of Len's quixotic theories. By what possible chance could a child of that age know how to manage money? She would make ducks and drakes of the whole fortune in less than a year!"

A letter, addressed to Evadne, lay upon a pile of legal papers in an open drawer at his side.

"I enclose herewith a letter to Evadne," his brother had written, "giving full and minute explanations as to her best course in the matter. These she will follow implicitly, under your supervision, and I feel confident the result will be a well-developed character along the lines on which women, through no fault of their own, are so lamentably deficient, namely, the proper conduct of business and management of money."

Judge Hildreth looked again at the envelope, with its clear, bold address. "That is not the handwriting of a fool," he muttered. "I wish I could make up my mind what to do."

He was silent, and through the solemn hush of midnight his good and evil angels contended for his soul. As the Judge pondered, it seemed to him that it was less his own mind than some spirits that argued one against the other, and this was what they said:

"It is not a question to be decided by your judgment. There is no other course left open to you."

"It is a most unprecedented proceeding. You should have been appointed her guardian with sole control."

"It is your brother's last will and testament."

"Some wills are made to be broken. It is against sound reason."

"It is the only honorable thing to do."

"It is unnecessary. The child need not know, and, if she did, would thank you from saving her from care."

"It is your brother's money. He had a right to do as he would in arranging for his own daughter."

"If he had known to what straits this year's speculations have brought you he would have been glad to give you a lift."

"Your niece will be anxious to have your advice as to profitable investments. You can borrow money from her."

"That would be awkward, in case the bottom fell out of the mine. A little capital in hand would give you a chance to water the Panhattan stock, and develop a new lead in the Silverwing."

"If you use money that does not belong to you, you will be a thief."

"If you do not use it, you will be a pauper. You have paper out now to five times the amount of your income. This is an interposition of Providence to save you from ruin."

"What right had you to put yourself in the way of ruin?"

"You did it to advance the interests of your family. The Bible says, 'If any provide not for his own kindred, he is worse than an infidel.'"

"If you do this thing you will be dishonored in the sight of God."

"If you do not save yourself from this temporary embarrassment, you will be disgraced in the eyes of the world. You owe it to your position in society, and the church, to keep above the waves."

The listening spirits heard a low malicious laugh, and the white robed angel turned sadly away.

Judge Hildreth had thrust Evadne's letter with his own far under the pile of papers and locked the drawer.

But he must say something on the subject to Evadne. His conscience would not let him be wholly silent. Perhaps she would make some admission of her own incapacity to manage her fortune, which would justify him in investing it for her. Such a conversation would be managed better away from home, when there was no danger of interruption from his wife and daughters.

"I am going for a long ride in the country, Evadne," he said the next morning, "would you like to come with me?"

Evadne gave a glad assent. After her beautiful tropical life, it seemed to her as if she should choke, shut away from the wide expanse of sky, which she loved, among monotonous rows of houses and dingy streets.

As they left the city behind them and the road swept out into the open, she gave a long sigh of delight. Her uncle laughed.

"Well, Evadne, does it please you?"

"It is the first time I have felt as if I could breathe!" she exclaimed.

"So you don't take kindly to Marlborough? Well, I suppose it is a rude awakening from your sunny land, but you will get used to it. We grow accustomed to all life's disagreeable surprises as time rolls on."

Evadne shivered. "I do not think I shall ever grow accustomed to it, Uncle Lawrence."

"Ah, you are young. We grow wiser as our hair turns gray."

"If that is the only way of getting wisdom, I do not care to grow wise, Uncle Lawrence."

"Not grow wise, Evadne!" said her uncle, quizzically, "in this age, when women claim a surplusage of all the brain power bestowed upon the race! What will you do when you have to attend to business?"

"Business," echoed Evadne, "I have never thought about it, Uncle Lawrence."

"No turn for dollars and cents, eh? Did your father never consult you about his affairs?"

Evadne's lip quivered. "Oh, yes," she said, and her words were a cry of pain, "he consulted me about everything, but I do not think there was ever any mention of money. Does money constitute business, Uncle Lawrence?"

"Wealth gives power, Evadne. Money is one of the greatest things in the world. While we are on the subject, I may as well tell you that your father has written me concerning the disposition of his property. I shall look after your interests carefully, together with my own, and give you the same quarterly allowance that my own girls have. When you are older I will go more into detail, but it is not worth while now to worry your head over columns of uninteresting figures. I shall open an account for you at the National Bank, and you can draw on that for your expenses. Your aunt will initiate you into the mysteries of shopping. By the way, you must have gone through that experience in Barbadoes. How did you manage there?"

Evadne turned her head away and clenched her hands tightly, as the flood of bitter-sweet memories threatened to engulf her. "Papa always went with me," she said slowly; "whatever he liked, I chose."

Judge Hildreth gave a sigh of relief. He had extricated himself from a difficult position with diplomatic skill. It did not occur to him that a lie which is half the truth is the meanest sort of a lie. He had acquainted his niece with all that was necessary for her to know at present, and at the same time left himself a loophole of escape from the imputation of disregarding his brother's wishes. When she became old enough to assume the responsibility, and he got his affairs straightened out sufficiently to admit of transferring to her care the funds which were so absolutely essential to his present success, he would put Evadne in full possession of her inheritance. Evadne's admission of her inexperience had proved the wisdom of his decision. By her own acknowledgment, his niece had never given a thought to the subject. His brother's plan would be an imprudence from which he was bound to shield her.

In Evadne's mind also, thought was busy. "Money is one of the greatest things in the world," her uncle said, and she had read that morning, "tongues shall cease, and knowledge shall be done away, but love never faileth. Now abideth faith, hope and love, the greatest of these is love." Was her cousin Louis right? Did Christians and the Bible not agree? And the business of her life was to find Jesus Christ. Was there any money in that?

Hollywood, Mr. Hawthorne's beautiful home, was the Judge's destination. As he turned out of the main road, John Randolph, who as usual was busy about the farm, opened the gate for him, and the Judge gave him a familiar nod and a "Thank you, John."

When they reached the house where Judge Hildreth had business with Mr. Hawthorne, Evadne was in an ecstasy of silent rapture. She had never dreamed what a New England farm might be. Its varied beauty, clad in the dazzling robes of early summer, came upon her with the suddenness of a revelation. She begged to be allowed to wait for her uncle out of doors, and wandered slowly on, past the great barns, to where the wide gate stretched across the green road. When she reached it she stopped, and looked with keen delight at the beautiful creatures in the fields on either side. The sunshine fell upon her with a loving warmth; in the distance she could hear the whir of a mowing machine, and the shouts of the men at work; a magnificent young horse thrust his head familiarly over the fence near by, and under the shade of a great tree Primrose, with her graceful calf beside her, was lazily chewing her cud.

Everything spoke of contentment and comfort and peace. An unutterable longing seized upon the lonely girl. Here at least she would have God's creatures to love, and his woods, and the sky! She laid her head down upon the gate with a smothered cry.

"If I only belonged, like the cows—."

"Pitty lady."

"Startled by the sweet baby voice, Evadne looked up, to find a pair of laughing blue eyes peeping sympathetically at her. The sunbonnet had fallen back and the golden curls were tossed in luxurious confusion over the little head.

Evadne caught the child in her arms.

"You little darling."

"Yes, me is," said the child, resting contentedly within Evadne's embrace, as if, with the mysterious telepathy of childhood, she recognized a spiritual affinity which she was bound to help.

"Me's very nice! Don says so!"

"And who is Don?" asked Evadne.

"Don's my bootiful man. Me's doin to marry Don when me gets big. Oh, dere he is!" and breaking from Evadne, she rolled herself between the bars of the gate, and ran at the top of her speed towards John Randolph, who just then appeared around a bend in the road, one arm thrown lightly over the neck of the horse he had been training.

"Hulloa, Nansie." Evadne heard his cheery greeting, saw him stoop and lift the child on to the horse's back, and was so interested in the pretty scene that she forgot she was a stranger. When she came to herself with a start, the little cavalcade had reached the gate, and John Randolph stood before her with his hat in his hand.

Evadne bowed.

"It is so beautiful," she said. "I have been waiting for my uncle, and lost myself among the harmonies of nature."

John Randolph's eyes lightened.

"It is God's world," he answered, with a sweet reverence.

Evadne looked full into the shining face.

"Do you know Jesus Christ?" she cried impulsively.

The face softened into a great tenderness. "He is my King!"

"And do you love him?"

"With all there is of me."

A servant came just then to say the Judge was waiting.

"I will come at once." Evadne said courteously. Then she turned once more to John.

"And what do you think of life?" she cried softly.

"Life," he said, and there was a strange exultant ring in his voice.—"Life is a beautiful possibility."

There was no time for more, but in the spirit realm of kinship no multitude of [illegible] had passed, yet in that little space two souls had met. What did it matter if the devious turnings of life should lead them far apart, or the barring gate of circumstances forever separate them. They had found each other.

"Pitty lady, Nan loves you dear," and the child, whom John had seated on the broad top-rail of the gate, held up her rosy lips for a kiss.

Instinctively Evadne held out her hand to John. Spiritual ethics laugh at the conventionalities of time.

"Good-bye," she said, "and thank you."

She looked back once to wave her hand to little Nan. John was standing as she had left him, one arm encircling the child, who nestled close to him, while over his right shoulder the horse had thrust his handsome head. Always afterward she saw him so.

Long after the sound of the carriage wheels had died away, John stood motionless, beholding again as in a vision, the earnest face and wonderful gray eyes. Then he stooped for his hat, which had fallen to the ground when he had taken her hand in his. As he did so, he saw a dainty bit of lawn lying on the other side of the gate. He put his hand between the bars and caught it just as the breeze was about to blow it away. He looked at the name which was delicately traced in one corner with a stange sense of pleasure. Evadne.

"It fits her," he said to himself. "There's a sweet elusiveness about her. She makes me think of a bird. She'll let you come just so far, until she gets to trust you, and then you'll have all her sweetness.

He drew a long breath, which was strangely like a sigh, and folding the handkerchief carefully, put it in his pocket.

"Pitty lady," murmured little Nan drowsily, and John caught her up and kissed her—he could not have told why.

"I do think Dorothy Bruce is the kindest creature!" exclaimed Marion one Saturday morning, as they lingered with a pleasant sense of leisure over the breakfast table. "She offered to give up the whole of to-day to me. I thought it was lovely, when she works so hard all the week."

"Give it up to you! Why, what do you mean, Marion? We never have anything to do with her in school. What could you possibly want of her here?"

"Oh! It is that doleful algebra," sighed Marion. "It is utterly impossible for me to get it into my head, and Dorothy takes to it like a duck to water, and she is a born teacher. Madame Castle says her aptitude for imparting knowledge amounts to a genius. You must allow it was kind of her, Isabelle."

Isabelle shrugged her shoulders.

"Self interested, likely. That sort of people would do anything to obtain a foothold."

"Oh, Isabelle!" cried Evadne. "Do have a little faith in your fellow-man! Why should you set yourself up on a pinnacle and despise everyone who is poor?"

Louis looked up from the paper he had been reading.

"There are two things Isabelle has no faith in, Evadne. The Declaration of Independence and the book she lent you. One says all men are free and equal, the other that God has made of one blood all the nations of the earth. Her serene highness objects to this. She will have the blue blood come in somewhere, though where she gets it from heaven only knows."

"Louis, I do wish you would not be so radical!" Isabelle said peevishly. "You must admit there is such a thing as culture and refinement."

"Certainly, I admit it. The only thing I object to is that you talk as if you possessed a monopoly of the article, whereas I hold that it is just a question of environment. It is no thanks to you that you were not born a Hottentot or a Choctaw. Give yourself the same ancestors and surroundings as your chimney-sweep and wherein would you be superior to him? And when it comes to ancestry, by the way, probably Miss Bruce can trace her's back to some of the grand old Highland chiefs who covered themselves with glory long before the lineage of Hildreth had emerged from obscurity."

THAT "RAFFLE FOR SOULS"

It is Now proved beyond all Dispute, that the Raffle Actually Took Place in Mexico

SOME time ago THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published a brief article relative to a "Raffle for Souls," which was said to have taken place in a Catholic Church in Puebla, Mexico. The statements in that article (which was reproduced from a contemporary), were immediately denied in interested quarters, and the production of proof was challenged.

In order that all question as to the accuracy of the statements published in these columns might be set at rest, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has procured from Mexico the necessary corroborative evidence.

A "Gran Rifa de Animas" (or "Raffle for Souls"), was announced in the issue of El Amigo de la Verdad ("Friend of the Truth"), published at Puebla, Oct. 19, 1898. On the first page of that journal there appeared an announcement, signed by Perfectus, Bishop of Puebla, stating the object of this raffle, which he designated as a "Loteriae pro Animabus Purgatorii" ("Lottery for Spirits in Purgatory"). Printed circulars, bearing the stamp of the Curacy of Puebla, were extensively distributed. These circulars described the object of the lottery, and stated the prices to be paid for tickets. Each circular was marked at the bottom, "A copy of the original."

A well-known paper in the City of Mexico is El Universal. In its issue of Oct. 12, 1898, it published this timely article in which the "raffle" scheme was fully ventilated:

"PIOUS RAFFLES

"The friars have always got to be as God made them. Not only are they agreed to keep the multitude in a state of fanaticism and brutality, but they also endeavor, by every means suggested by their infernal malice and cunning, to make the most money they can out of the faithful by masses for souls.

"In some of the parishes of the suburbs, they have established the custom of Raffles of Souls, which consists in drawing a number representing so many souls which will come out from Purgatory, only because the pious believer has drawn them out of the globe of the lottery.

"Of course, this ticket costs some cents, and if, for example, the wife of a poor laborer goes devoutly to hear mass, she does not count on this raffle of souls, which is proposed to her by the sacristan or the father almoner, and often finds herself hard put to it to pay for the number of the drawing, which may fall to her by luck."

It would seem that further evidence of the existence of the custom of holding these raffles "for the liberation of souls from Purgatory" was not needed; yet it is at hand from other sources whose reliability is beyond question. Rev. Francis S. Borton, a missionary of the M. E. Church of the United States, now stationed at Puebla (and who is known to Bishops Fitzgerald, Fowler, Joyce and Hurst), writes as follows:

"PUEBLA, OCT. 24, 1898.

"'The Christian Herald,' New York City:—

"I send you under another cover: (1) a copy in the original Spanish of the Soul Raffle announcement, (2) a paper containing a letter in Latin and Spanish by the Bishop of Puebla, admitting the truth of such raffle, (3) a supplement of the Christian Advocate of Mexico, in Spanish, with full description of such raffles. The English translation with notes, is in press, will be out this week, and I will at once send you a copy.

"The matter has been talked of in the secular and religious press of the civilized world from here to New York, to Rome, and to Buenos Ayres. It has been denied and lied about, but never disproved. The Bishop of Puebla has been forced to confess, over his own signature, that such raffles of souls are practiced in his diocese. Furthermore, he has, during the last ten days, published a decree forbidding the practice of these soul raffles in his diocese this year, in the churches; but has said that all who cared to raffle for souls could do so in the Episcopal Palace, where he lives. This I have from undeniable authority. We are scoring a big point in the reformation of Mexico, when we succeed in doing away with this abominable, heathenish practice.

"F. S. BORTON."

Theda A. Parker, of West Alden, N. Y., former missionary in Puebla, writes:

"It was my custom while living in the city of Puebla, Mexico, to frequently take a walk before breakfast, and on such occasions I often stepped for a few minutes into two or three of the more than seventy Catholic churches which the city contains. I had become curious to know whether at the same seasons the same ceremonies were being conducted in the different churches. I thought I could judge from the appearance of the churches whether this was so, for I had noticed that the placing of some of the images on certain great days depended on the event to be celebrated.

"Nearly every block of this city has its Catholic church. The one in our block was called Santa Catarina. On the first Monday in November, I entered this church, and saw immediately that something unusual was going on. In the centre of the church was what looked like a small church tower, the lower part square, the upper pointed. It was black, and the three sides that I could see contained windows, with black curtains draped inside. On the side, away from the altar, sat the Bishop of Puebla, facing the black structure, with priests to the right and left of him, also seated. More priests than usual were officiating at the various altars, and I was much puzzled to know what was the nature of the service. Returning home, I asked the cook (a Catholic) what kind of a service was being held in Santa Catarina, and described what I had seen. She answered:

"'I don't know, Senorita. They do many things here which I never saw done in the little town I came from.'

"At supper time she said, 'Senorita, I have found out what was going on at Santa Catarina this morning. I asked Rosa (an old blind woman, who came to the house every day for the remnants of the dinner). She said that during the month of October, the Sisters go about among the Catholic families, asking if any one has died during the year whose soul the family would like to have come out of Purgatory on the first Monday in November. If such is the case, they pay a peceta (twenty-five cents), and the name of the dead friend is written on a slip of paper and given to the Sisters.

"'These are kept until the first Monday in November, when the Bishop goes to one of the churches, and, after certain ceremonies, draws slips, and those whose names are drawn are delivered from Purgatory that morning. So their friends are told.'

"'This is called a 'rifa de animas', or raffle for souls, and takes place every year on the first Monday in November.'"

It may be added that either of the missionaries named or the editors of El Universal will be glad to furnish any other details desired concerning the "raffles for souls."

FRIENDS IN COUNCIL

The Adoption of a Child - Exacting Husbands - How to Receive Callers, Etc.

A QUESTION so vitally affecting the best interests of a family, and concerning its whole future so directly as the adoption of a child, should not be settled without much thought and much prayer. It is, however, a question for a husband and wife to answer for themselves, determining on their own course of action, without being overruled by relatives on either side. A bereaved mother, in a sweet and touching letter, tells me that her arms are empty, for God has taken away her dear little child. She and her husband have decided that they will, if their kindred do not continue to oppose them, adopt an orphan child, and bring it up as their own; surely a beautiful and Christian thing to do. But on the one hand, the husband's people cry out against the expense the child will be, as though the little one in heaven would not have been an expense had not God taken it hence; and on the other, the wife's kin exclaim that the care and bother will be too great for her, as though she would mind either, in case the child were her very own.

You must put aside these objections, dear friends, if you are in earnest, and act with independence. When I remember how many homeless children there are, how many are in institutions who would better be in families, I long to hear fathers and mothers speak as you do. To adopt a child, and give it pious, watchful nurture and a fair chance in this world, seems to me an act on which God must look in with peculiar approval.

But you must not overlook the possibility that you may yet have children born to you, children who will be bone of your bone and flesh of your flesh. In that case, you will need to be entirely just and fair to your adopted child, recognizing its rights and privileges, and not treating it with coldness, because other claimants on your love and income have arrived. Can you trust yourselves thus far? Settle the matter in your closets and before the searcher of hearts.

I have known several cases of adoption which have turned out most happily and blessedly for all concerned. I have never in a single instance known of the adopted child's proving ungrateful and unsatisfactory. In one family, known to me, a childless pair sought a public institution where the waifs and foundlings of a great city found such asylum as public charity gives the flotsam and jetsam of its streets. They chose a wee baby girl, in utter ignorance of her name and parentage; she was only a few months old; she never knew in after years that she was not their own child, and she developed into a noble and charming childhood, a girlhood of grace, a womanhood of rare talents and abilities. She was, you see, one of God's children, and he blessed the home which adopted her.

A FRIEND. You tell me that your husband has grown selfish and exacting; that although you once loved him dearly, your feeling is gradually changing to something very like hate. My dear, let me tell you frankly that I do not believe in love which changes so easily. Try on your own part to be thoughtful and solicitous of him, and see if it does not produce a change. Do not lay up remorseful regrets for yourself in days to come.

S. E. J. I think it is very sweet to be the older of two daughters and to be able, when mamma is engaged, to receive her callers, and to help in many ways as the daughter of the house can. When your mother is present, she will, of course, advance first to receive a visitor. In her absence you simply step forward cordially and offer your hand to any friend who enters your parlor. I have seen young people bow stiffly in their own home, but I have always been sorry to notice the omission of the pleasant handshake. When presented to strangers outside of your own house, it is not necessary to offer your hand; usually it is enough to bow pleasantly. If people say kind things to you, you have simply to make a polite answer in your turn. Always do what you can to contribute to the pleasure of a guest. Manners at the table are like manners everywhere else. They need simply to be quiet, gentle and unselfish. The essence of good breeding is unselfishness.

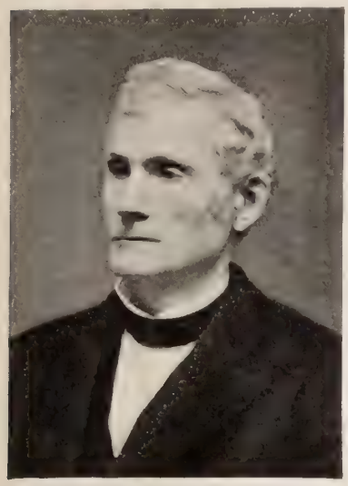
A Consecrated Life Closed

The Founder of the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting Passes Away

WITH the recent death of Mr. J. C. Lanphier, the founder of the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting, there passed away a personality which had become familiar to many thousands of New Yorkers. And not to New Yorkers alone, but to thousands of Christian men throughout the Union, for Mr. Lanphier was in a sense a national character.



THE LATE MR. J. C. LANPHIER

Founder of the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting

He was an earnest Christian business man, who loved the Lord's work and who gave up a lucrative business that he might devote himself wholly to bringing wandering souls into the Redeemer's Kingdom.

In 1857, during a time of great business anxiety and distress, the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting was founded. It had been decided by the Old North Dutch Church in Fulton street to adopt new methods of reaching outsiders with the Gospel message and to employ a missionary to go from house to house, visiting the sick and the discouraged. To this task Mr. Lanphier, then an active, energetic and magnetic man in the prime of life, was assigned. He devoted himself to it heart and soul, and it proved a blessing to all that section of the city. It became his habit to turn into the consistory room of the church every day, and there "shut to the door and commune with his Father who is in secret," and gain fresh spiritual strength for his duties. It occurred to him that there must be many, in that time of anxious concern, who would benefit by such seasons of prayer. He spoke of it to a few friends, who agreed with him. The consent of the consistory to hold the meetings in their room was obtained, and notices of the first meeting were issued. Mr. Lanphier was punctual at his post, but for nearly half an hour no one joined him. He remained, however; and presently one person came and afterwards four others. At the next meeting there were twenty present. The meetings were held every Wednesday, but at the fourth, when there was a large attendance, one of the persons present spoke of the benefit he had derived from the meeting, and urged that it be held daily. His proposal was put to the vote and carried unanimously. From that time to the present, a period of forty-one years, there has been no interruption. Regularly at noon on every business day, the voice of prayer and praise has gone up from the company of believers at the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting. It was necessary, as the number grew, to transfer the meeting from the consistory room to a larger hall.

Until September, 1893, the meeting continued under the charge of its founder, Mr. J. C. Lanphier. But the infirmities of age began to press heavily on the venerable Christian worker, and it was evident that he must soon give place to another. On the thirty-sixth anniversary of the first meeting, he formally committed the charge to Mr. C. F. Cutter, who has conducted the meetings ever since.

During Mr. Lanphier's incumbency as conductor of the work, 11,232 meetings were held, over 36,000 prayers were offered, and nearly a quarter of a million requests for prayer were received and laid before the meetings. It is on record that a multitude of the prayers offered in the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting have been most wonderfully answered. Probably no similar work in any country in the world has been more marvelously productive of spiritual results.

It is a fact that Hood's Sarsaparilla, the best medicine money can buy, does cure scrofula, salt rheum, catarrh, rheumatism and other diseases due to impure blood after other remedies failed.

A GOOD PRACTICE.

If You Want a Good Appetite and Perfect Digestion.

After each meal dissolve one or two of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets in the mouth and, mingling with the food, they constitute a perfect digestive, absolutely safe for the most sensitive stomach.

They digest the food before it has time to ferment, thus preventing the formation of gas and keeping the blood pure and free from the poisonous products of fermented, half-digested food.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets make the complexion clear by keeping the blood pure.

They increase flesh by digesting flesh-forming foods.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets is the only remedy designed especially for the cure of stomach troubles and nothing else.

One disease, one remedy, the successful physician of today is the specialist, the successful medicine is the medicine prepared especially for one disease.

A whole package taken at one time would not hurt you, but would simply be a waste of good material.

Over six thousand men and women in the state of Michigan alone have been cured of indigestion and dyspepsia by the use of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets.

Sold by all druggists at 50 cents per package.

DR. ROBERT HUNTER, recognized everywhere as the greatest living authority on diseases of the breathing organs, has just published a book on Consumption and other diseases of the Throat and Lungs. This book has created a sensation in medical and newspaper circles, because it shows beyond any question that Consumption, AS TREATED BY DR. HUNTER, is a curable disease. The book tells plainly the true nature of Consumption; its causes; its unmistakable symptons; how to prevent, and HOW IT CAN BE RADICALLY CURED.

The book is of such great importance to the welfare of the whole people that it has been decided to issue an edition of 50,000 copies in paper covers for free general distribution.

FROM THE NEW YORK HERALD:—

FROM THE NEW YORK SUN:—

"Dr. Hunter's recent book on Consumption and his wonderful cures that have been reported, effectually remove all doubts as to the curability of this dread disease"

TO EVANGELIZE PORTO RICO

Mr. Frank L. Smith Arrives, Ready to Begin Spiritual Work on the Island

AS we go to press, a brief message comes to us from Porto Rico, announcing the arrival of Mr. Frank L. Smith, who is commissioned to survey the field with a view to establishing Sunday Schools at San Juan, Ponce, Mayaguez, and other available points on the island. Writing from Ponce, Mr. Smith states that as he passed through the town on December 20, the children were being presented with American flags by the Grand Army of the Republic, amid much enthusiasm. The one little Protestant church in Ponce—the only one on the island—was open for preaching on the Lord's Day, by the chaplain of the American military post. There was no Sunday School. He did not discover any religious work there, but several schools are open to teach English and Spanish.

Mr. Smith, who has formerly been the Camp Secretary of the International Committee of Y.M.C.A., for the Seventh Army Corps, commanded by General Fitzhugh Lee, since its organization, is now transferred to Porto Rico, commissioned to organize a general work on Associational lines, with special reference to the needs of our soldiers. Mr. Smith writes:

On reaching Santiago, one of the healthful signs of religious activity among the denominational boards in the States came to my notice. Dr. W. R. Lambuth, Secretary of the Board of Foreign Missions, M. E. Church, South, has been here in company with Rev. H. W. Baker, mission pastor at Key West, and rented a commodious building for mission purposes. The plan includes a primary department with three teachers, a school for business men to learn the English language, and a Spanish school where Americans may acquire Spanish. Religious services will be held statedly by the mission pastor, who will also act as Spanish teacher. They hope to begin operations on January 1. Santiago needs the Gospel. The streets are lined with liquor stores, and American visitors are the best customers. A Cuban friend said to me: "Wine and liquor has killed more of your countrymen than war and camp fever."

My next, I hope, will announce the successful institution of our work in San Juan, among the soldiers.

The "Father of the Senate"

Senator Justin Morrill, of Vermont, who passed away, December 28, at his home in Washington, was known by this peculiar title, having served continuously in the United States Senate a greater number of years than any of his colleagues, and because of his venerable age. He entered the Senate, March 4, 1867, and there is not a member living to-day who was Senator when he took his seat. His paternal title now falls to William B. Allison, of Iowa, and John P. Jones, of Nevada, who entered the Senate together, March 4, 1873. The former has been for many years Mr. Morrill's coadjutor on the Committee of Finance, of which the Vermont Senator was long the chairman. There are many members of the Senate over three score years and ten; Mr. Pettus' colleague, Mr. Morgan; Mr. Hawley, of Connecticut, and his colleague, Mr. Platt; Mr. Stewart, of Nevada; Mr. Hoar and Mr. Turpie.

A Life of Christian Service

On Dec. 1, 1898, at West Brattleboro, Vt., Mrs. S. E. Atwater, a noble Christian worker, passed away. For nearly thirty years she was principal of Oak Hill Seminary, West Haven, Conn. She was a graduate of Mount Holyoke Seminary. A few years later she married Rev. Edward Wright. They soon settled at West Haven and there her work as a teacher was begun. Mr. Wright died, but though his loss was a heavy blow to the young wife, she resolutely carried the work along. Many came to Oak Hill Seminary from various parts of the United States, and many went from it better fitted for life's work, some as wives, some as teachers, and some as missionaries to foreign lands. For nearly thirty years she continued this work. She was afterward married to Rev. Jason Atwater, whom she also survived. The infirmities of age and financial embarrassments at last led her to give up her work. Mrs. Atwater was much interested in temperance and missionary work, and did much for the education of the poor whites and negroes of the South. Her labor on earth was faithfully done, and she looked forward to a home with Jesus, and a happy reunion with kindred gone before. L. J. ROOT.

ARE YOUR LUNGS WEAK?

To Every Sufferer from Catarrh, Lung Weakness or Consumption a Great Specialist Sends His New and Wonderful

TREATMENT FREE.

[illegible] will regard it as a kind of insult to be asked if they have weak lungs. All seem to have a solid faith in the soundness of their own breathing machine. In cases of trouble they will admit there is a "heavy cold," "a touch of bronchitis," or even "a spell of Asthma," but as to weak or unsound lungs, never, NEVER. Even the poor consumptive who scarcely speaks without coughing, whose cheeks are wasted, hollow and bear the hectic flush of doom, will assure you with glistening eyes that his cold is on the mend and he will be all right when the weather changes.

This is a sad and pitiable form of delusion. It is not our business here to discuss the reason of it. Its prevalence, however, is beyond all doubt, and we feel that we are right in holding it responsible for a neglect of serious sible dangers. Nobody can afford to neglect them or "let them wear out," or "get better in the spring," or any other tomfoolery that leads only to wreck and ruin. Lung troubles don't move backward. Weak lungs don't grow strong by themselves—you must heal them and strengthen them and rid them of the very earliest germs of disease or you are simply committing a form of suicide. Either you must cure your lung troubles or THEY WILL KILL YOU.

That's the whole situation in a nutshell.

Never was there a cure for lung troubles equal to the newly discovered Dr. Slocum treatment. It is [illegible] a system of three remedies that are used simultaneously, and supplement each other's curative action. The treatment has immortalized Dr. Slocum's name. It cures weak lungs, bronchitis, asthma, coughs, consumption, catarrh and every other ailment lung troubles in ourselves and others—that it is almost criminal.

How many a poor bread-earner there is who keeps on and on at his daily toil, taking cough medicines by fits and starts, but never quite curing his cough, while this same cough is but a symptom of decay that is eating into his lungs, and will in time cause their destruction. Thus does a wife observe her husband, or parents witness the struggle of a darling child, the youth or the maiden who was to rejoice their later years, while no steps are taken to battle with the evil until consumption has seized on one more victim. It is simply terrible to think how far we may be guilty by our indifference to the lung troubles of those near and dear to us. It is also a sad thought that we may hug a delusion as to our own health that we only get rid of when life itself must pay the forfeit.

Let us quit the distressing subject to come to what is practical. Nobody can afford to think lightly of lung troubles. Nobody can afford to be mistaken about their pos-of the pulmonary region. It destroys every germ that can affect the respiratory system, and even in advanced stages of lung trouble positively arrests the tubercular growth, while it also builds up the patient so that his system is enabled to throw off scrofula, rheumatism and other wasting diseases. Thousands of cured cases already prove these claims. Thousands of grateful people bless the discovery.

Dr. Slocum wants everybody to know the surprising merits of his system. He has arranged to give a free treatment (three bottles of the cure) to all sufferers who will apply to him by letter, mentioning The Christian Herald. Full instructions for use accompany each treatment. Your correspondence on the subject is strictly private and your three free bottles come to you in a plain package. Surely if you have weak lungs you will be glad to get a free treatment that is offered in such a generous spirit.

Write to Dr. T. A. Slocum, 98 Pine St., New York City, giving full address.

Delay only makes your trouble worse.

THE REJOICING CONVERT

FREE from the burden that grieved me,
I'm washed in the Saviour's blood.
Jesus has kindly received me
As one of the children of God.

Now, with my ears will I listen,
List, to discover his will;
Ready to hear, and to hasten,
Every command to fulfill.

Now, with my tongue will I praise him.
He is the author of light;
Each distant planet obeys him,
Keeping their vigils by night.

Now, with my hands, will I gather
Sheaves for his garner above;
Trusting my Heavenly Father
Will fill my soul with his love.

Now, with my feet, will I follow,
Whither his Spirit shall lead.
He who provides for the sparrow
Surely his servant shall feed.

Then, when my work is completed,
Jesus will bid me to come.
I at his side will be seated,
Safely in Heaven—at Home.

A Prehistoric Monster

The petrified bones of the most gigantic animal ever unearthed, have lately been discovered in Wyoming, by Prof. W. H. Reed, Assistant Professor of the geological department of the State University, and are in process of reconstruction. The smallest bone of the skeleton is more than a man can lift; and in comparison to a mammoth, this animal was in size as a horse is to a dog. The only fossil which can be placed in even approximate comparison with it, is Prof. Marsh's famous brontosaur, also discovered in Wyoming, by Prof. Reed; and this is a child beside it, weighing in life, according to estimate, about 80,000 pounds, while the dinosaur must have tipped the scales at 120,000. There were no scales however, in the Jurassic age—to which this creature belonged—and if there had been, the dinosaur would hardly have been invited, for the price of several "pennies in the slot" to test his weight upon it; for, says Prof. Reed: "Every time he put his foot down, it covered more than a square yard of ground, and must have fairly shaken the earth." Prof. Reed, further describes what his dinosaur must have been:

He had a neck thirty feet in length, a tail perhaps sixty. The cavity of his body, with lungs and intestines out, would make a hall thirty-four feet in length, sixteen feet in width, and arched over probably twelve feet in height. Such a space, if properly arranged, would seat at least forty people. A set of fours in cavalry could easily have ridden abreast between his front and hind legs, provided he had not objected. The smallness of the head of this animal is a peculiar thing. I should say that the head of this mighty dinosaur, was probably not larger than a ten-gallon keg. He must have been a very sluggish creature, as the brain cavity would certainly not warrant the belief that his brain weighed to exceed four or five pounds.

For Rheumatism and Sleeplessness

We Offer the Simplest and the Best Treatment Free.

To all who know the misery and hopelessness of days and nights tortured with rheumatism, neuralgia, sleeplessness and pains in the trunk, muscles and bones, we make a plain and fair proposition, which we believe is filled with hope for sufferers.

DR. BROWN-SEQUARD, of Paris, said that these ailments arose from a too great flow of electricity from the body. He thought that if this flow could be stopped the vital forces would be so invigorated as to overcome the troubles. Experimenting on this line led to the discovery of the Slayton Electric Switch Glass Casters. Used on a bed they insulate the occupant completely. They prevent any flow of electricity from the body to the earth. Thus none of the natural forces is weakened. The curative results are wonderful.

No one can fully explain why so simple a remedy can drive away forever these terrible evils. The great, saving fact remains, however, that the use of the Slayton Electric Switch Glass Bed Casters is every day completely curing cases of rheumatism and like diseases which seemed desperate.

Read the following testimonials and see if it is not worth your while to at least make a test of this wonderful treatment, which costs absolutely nothing to try, and which cannot possibly harm you in any way.

A PREACHER'S DISCOVERY.

Dr. Blosser, the well-known Minister of the Gospel, and medical specialist, is the originator of one of the world's most valuable means of curing disease. It is a fact well known among physicians, as well as by sufferers, that while there are many proposed remedies for Catarrh, Bronchitis, Asthma, etc., heretofore there has been known no reliable cure.

Dr. Blosser, in his regular practice, had under his care many patients suffering from these diseases, and after trying all the remedies recommended in the medical books, without satisfactory results, he was driven to the necessity of devising an entirely new mode of treatment. He discovered a combination of medical plants, which when smoked and inhaled, applies a warm medical vapor to every diseased part, destroying the germs of the disease and healing the ulcerated mucous membrane, without injury to the most delicate constitution.

Having demonstrated in his practice the wonderful curative properties of this remedy, he publicly announced his discovery and during the past twenty-three years thousands of helpless sufferers have been cured. He cured one case of 45 years' standing, and others of 15, 20 and 25 years' standing. These facts warrant us in announcing to sufferers the world over, that a positive cure has been found for catarrhal diseases.

50,000 Trial Packages FREE.

We have recently given away 100,000 trial packages of Dr. Blossers's Catarrh Cure to persons afflicted with Catarrh, Bronchitis, Asthma, Catarrhal Deafness, etc., and now offer 50,000 trial packages, absolutely free. If the trial package does not impress you favorably you will have been at no expense. I have received many letters during the past year from various sections of the United States asking me as to the certificate I gave you being a genuine one. I have replied to each and have advised them to give the remedy a fair trial, and I believed they would be cured. I have used it in my practice whenever a case presented. I have

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

We have received a number of letters containing inquiries concerning the prospects of opening up the proposed Sunday School work in Porto Rico. Among those who have written on this subject are: W. D., Friendly, W. Va.; A. de B., Marshfield Hills, Mass.; Geo. F. M., Little Marsh, Pa.; D. D. A., North Yakima, Wash.; Mrs. Emma G., Spokane, Wash.; Miss E. L. B., Baton Rouge, La.; H. C. M., Philadelphia; Mrs. A. W. B., Worcester, Mass.; N. S. P., Groton, N. H.; D. J. T., Syeamore, Kan.; G. L. L., Bradenville, Pa.; Miss M. B., Ticonderoga, N. Y., and others. Several of those mentioned in the foregoing list have volunteered for service. Our friends, and especially those who are interested in Gospel work in Porto Rico, will be pleased to learn that Gen. John Eaton has gone to San Juan on an important mission (as stated in another part of this issue), and we hope, after he has had opportunity for investigation to hear fully from him as to the best methods of beginning operations on the island.

G. W. D., Norway, Me. Is it a sin in God's sight to commit suicide? Could a man hope that in killing himself he might at once join his beloved kindred in heaven?

There is not the slightest ground for entertaining such a hope. We are distinctly told that no murderer hath eternal life abiding in him; and a suicide is a murderer. The suicide, in taking his life, would be taking the surest of all means for making the separation between him and his dead Christian loved ones, eternal. His course should be to live so that he may hope to join them when his time comes to go. The suicide shows that he cannot trust God; that he is unwilling to do his will in the world, and that he is a coward in running away from his duty. Put the thought out of your mind. You will live to thank God that you did so.

"Anxious Christian," Cincinnati, O. Would it not have been better for God to have refrained from giving Adam and Eve the choice between good and evil, seeing that their choice of evil has brought so much misery on their descendants?

Why do you trouble yourself about Adam and Eve? Every man has the power now of choosing between good and evil, and he has before him innumerable examples of the consequences of choosing evil, yet he chooses it. There is no need to worry about Adam and Eve when we in our own persons are repeating their sin. Neither are we justified in criticizing God's ways. We do not and cannot fully understand his purposes. It may have been that he designed to produce a race so high in the scale of being as to be endowed with the power of choice, which should by choosing evil learn by experience the consequences of evil, and should finally be redeemed and voluntarily choose the good. If you wanted your son to grow up a strong, godly man, you would not restrict his liberty and keep him shut up in your home. You would warn him of the consequences of evil, and train him to overcome temptation. He would not be strong if he were not tried.

G. A. H., Fisher, Minn. Why is it that Christ's lineage is traced by Matthew through Solomon, and by Luke through Nathan?

The differences in the two genealogies have given rise to many theories. The most probable is that Luke gives the genealogy of Mary, while Matthew gives that of Joseph. Evidently the two evangelists would otherwise have contradicted each other at the first step; for Matthew says Joseph was the son of Jacob (1: 16), while Luke says (3: 23), he was the son of Heli. In Luke, however, the word "son" is not in the original, but is supplied by the translators to make sense. If the theory mentioned above is correct, the word they supplied should have been "son-in-law."

Reader, Flint Hill, Va. Is the habit of drinking strong drink, to excess, hereditary?

Some physicians and physiologists contend that no habits are hereditary, but observation is against their contention. The children of drunkards may have witnessed so much of the evil of drunkenness that they make a hard and successful fight to keep themselves from falling victims to the habit, so that statistics would be untrustworthy. But the testimony of many drunkards has been that their parents—one or both—were drunkards, too.

Many of our readers have been specially interested in the letters that have recently appeared in THE MAIL-BAG from owners of very old Bibles. Some of these Bibles are held as very precious heirlooms, having been handed down from generation to generation. Intelligence of other very old and greatly treasured Bibles reaches us from several points. Mrs. [illegible]

Reader——. Why is Acts 8: 37 omitted from the Revised Version of the Bible?

Some of the ancient manuscripts did not contain the verse and some only part of it. The revisers, therefore, drew the inference that it had been inserted at a date later than that of the original work, and omitted it. The omission is explained in the middle column of the page in the Revised Version issued by THE [illegible]

Geo. A. F. There are few things that will go farther towards demoralizing a church than godlessness in the choir. Those who are specially chosen to sing the praises of the Lord in sight of the congregation should be exemplary Christian people, of good reputation, modest and neither disposed to vanity nor levity. Possibly all that was needed in the case you mention could have been accomplished by a quiet private admonition from the pastor. See answer to W. S. J. H. F., Harristown, Ills. Is it a sin [illegible] not of his own denomination and to worship there when he does not [illegible]

Such a one would do much better to attend services at his own church, instead of wandering off in other directions for the sake of novelty or sensation. Some, from the very love of change, become little better than spiritual vagrants, without a permanent church home, and consequently with a poor outlook for spiritual development.

K. D. S. Is anything known as to the identity of the lost ten tribes?

You are probably aware that an effort has been made to identify them with the Anglo-Saxon race. Some of the reasons advanced by the advocates of the theory are weighty. It is probable, however, that through intermarriage with the peoples among whom they were scattered their identity as a separate people was lost. Many of them doubtless returned individually with the Jews under Ezra and Nehemiah.

C. C., Wabash, Ind. Is there any foundation for the statement that the Pharaoh of the Exodus did not perish in the Red Sea, at the time the Israelites crossed dryshod?

A doubt about his having been drowned at the time, was first aroused by the records on the monuments which narrated events of his career of a later date than the Exodus. This is confirmed by what is known of his character. He was a timid, cowardly man, very likely to have remained on dry land, while his generals led the army in pursuit of the Israelites. Moses knowing that he was in command of the Egyptian army, and knowing that the army was drowned, might have assumed that Pharaoh was drowned, too, without actual proof of the fact.

IN THIS OLD BUILDING, REV. H. W. BEECHER IS SAID TO HAVE PREACHED HIS FIRST SERMON

There are conflicting claims as to the scene of the commencement of famous ministries. It is generally stated in the published biographies of Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, that his first ministerial charge was at Lawrenceburg, a small settlement near Cincinnati, on the Ohio River. Batavia, O., however, now claims the distinction of being the place where he preached his first sermon. Mr. Wm. Ronster, of Belfast, O., has forwarded to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this photograph of the old building—once a church but now a barn—in which that event is said to have taken place.

of the leaves in the first of the book are missing. It contains "The Psalms of David, of the old translation, printed as they shall be said or sung in churches." Then follows: "To the Most High and Mighty Prince, James, by the grace of God, King of Great Britain, France and Ireland, Defender of the Faith," etc. There are eight or ten pages—a kind of preface—"The Translatours to the Reader." There is also the full Apocrypha. "The whole book of Psalms is given in metre, with apt notes to sing them withall." These notes, arranged to direct the time, are certainly unique music for only the treble. It is claimed that this book came over with some of the earlier settlers, and for many years belonged to different members of the Gould family of New York State. It came to me through Grandmother Gould in 1869.

Mrs. J. A. Hatley, Tarrytown, N. Y., writes: "I have a Bible in my possession, an heirloom; on the title page is printed, 'Edinburgh. Printed by the heir of Andrew Anderson, printer to His Most [illegible] MDCLXXXIII'"

Rev. J. P. Lee, brother of Daniel Lee, missionary to Flat Head Indians, Oregon, writes from University Station, Los Angeles, Calif.: "I have a Bible translated by Thad. Boza, 1615. Please inform me how I can find a purchaser for it."

Mr. Geo. F. Burns, Toronto, Can., has also a very old Bible. He writes:

It was published in London in 1637, by Robert Barker, printer to the "King's Most Excellent Majestie." It contains both the Old and New Testa- you not wish so important a book to be true and accurate? All the labor bestowed on the revision, all the learning brought to bear upon it and all the money expended, were for the purpose of getting the exact meaning of the original. We do not like to have errors in any book, least of all in the Bible. The Revised Version is not absolutely perfect, but it is much better than the ordinary or Authorized Version.

Reader, N. B., Mass. When was Utah taken into the Union as a State and upon what condition?

The act of admission became a law July 10, 1894. The basis was the renunciation of polygamy.

A. P., Worcester, Mass. Many think that there is no life beyond the grave. Is there, apart from the Bible, proof that there is?

Not absolute proof. How could there be? It must be a matter of revelation, seeing that none who die return to tell us. But there are inferences which we may draw. One is the universal longing for another life, which we think would not be in the mind if it was not to be satisfied. Another ground for belief is that our lives here bear the impress of preparation. They seem to be a training, an education, a discipline for something greater. A third reason is that so much here needs adjust

HOME LIFE OF THE DIPLOMATIC CORPS

MARIE SOPHIA SANTO-THYRSO, DAUGHTER OF THE PORTUGUESE MINISTER

WASHINGTON is the most cosmopolitan city of the Western Continent. The sight of an Oriental in his long silken robes, or wearing a red fez, gay-colored trousers, and girdle, passing along the public streets, awakens no wonderment in the mind of the Washingtonian. He knows that the strangely attired man is either a member of the Diplomatic Corps or one of the constant stream of visitors who are always present at the National Capital.

Thirty-three foreign governments are represented at Washington, and five of them own their mission property. There are two classes of ranking diplomats: ambassadors, and ministers plenipotentiary, and it has only been within the past five or six years that our government has raised its missions abroad to the rank of an embassy. We now have six ambassadors; they are stationed at London, Rome, Berlin, Paris, St. Petersburg and the City of Mexico, and as an offset, these countries have six ambassadorial representatives at Washington.

LADY PAUNCEFOTE, WIFE OF THE BRITISH MINISTER

MME. DE SANTO-THYRSO
Wife of Portuguese Minister

MLLE. DE CASSINI
Grandniece of the Russian Ambassador

The British Embassy is out in the west end of Washington on Connecticut Avenue. It is a commodious brick building, plain and substantial, and very much after the style of an English gentleman's country residence. It stands in a small yard and is surrounded by a rather high picket fence of iron. It is a bit of English soil right in the heart of our American Capital, for the British government bought it nearly thirty years ago, and have owned it ever since. It is a handsomely furnished house. The front doors open into a broad hall running through its centre, and on the first landing of a fine, black-walnut stairway.

At the foot of the hall hangs a life-size painting of Queen Victoria. She stands in her regal robes with her sceptre in hand, and is the object of all others which catches the eye on entering the front door.

Sir Julian and Lady Pauncefote are elderly people. They have four grown daughters, and they all take a prominent part in the society affairs of the Capital. They are, of course, members of the Church of England, and are pew-holders in the old Saint John's Church on Lafayette Square. The little church, which has stood there since very early in the century, and which was attended so long by the Presidents and their families that it is still called "The Church of the Administration," is the most aristocratic place of worship in the town. Sir Julian has passed the age of retirement from the diplomatic service, but owing to his wide experience and skill he was retained at this post during the late war and the adjustment of peace. His successor is likely to be named at any time now.

Upon Sir Julian's retirement, the Italian ambassador, Baron de Fava, will become the Dean of the Corps, but there is little probability that he and the Baroness will make any attempt to fill the social position occupied by the retiring British official. Several years ago they lost their only son, a brilliant young man, who so ardently admired our republican form of government that he renounced his right to the family title, became an American citizen, and, at the time of his death, was occupying a professor's chair at Columbia. His untimely end was such a blow to his parents that they have remained in Italy almost continuously since, although it is probable that they will again take up their residence in Washington this winter.

The German Ambassador, Herr von Hollenben, is a bachelor, a very congenial, pleasant gentleman; and notwithstanding the fact that the palatial embassy on Highland Terrace has not a woman connected with it in any capacity whatever, it is managed in an admirable manner, and the social functions which take place there every season are decidedly successful. The embassy is the property of the government, and is filled with rare old German furniture and tapestries. Herr von Hollenben and his suite are Protestants, and he is an attendant at the Reformed Lutheran Church on Vermont Ave.

M. Cambon, the French Ambassador, was the gentleman who negotiated the peace protocol for Spain, and his name is familiar to every one in consequence. He received his Washington appointment last January, and when he came there a few months later he did not bring his family, and so has taken but little part in the social life of the Capital. The embassy is in the historic Porter House on H St.

Comte Cassini, of the Russian embassy, is the first ambassador to be accredited from Russia to Washington. The Comte is a widower, but his grandniece, who is his ward, has made her home with him since her babyhood, and she is the hostess of the embassy. She is a remarkably bright and attractive girl of eighteen and something of a linguistic wonder, as she speaks seven languages with ease.

While there are but six ambassadors at Washington, there are twenty-seven ministers plenipotentiary and resident, and they come from all parts of the world. The Netherlands, Sweden and Norway, and Denmark are represented by bachelor diplomats who maintain their legations in an unostentatious manner. They are all Protestants, and while not actively connected, they are communicants of the Lutheran churches. The Austrian-Hungarian government own their legation property just opposite the British Embassy on Connecticut Avenue, and a very smart place it certainly is. Mme. Hengelmuller von Hengervar, the minister's wife, has a taste for the beautiful, and under her regime the legation has been furnished exquisitely. In the dining-room there is a complete collection of portraits of the rulers of the house of Hapsburg. Viscountess de Santo-Thyrso, the wife of the Portuguese minister, is considered the beauty of the corps. She is as beautiful in character as she is in face and figure, and her little kindly deeds greatly endear her to her friends.

In future letters, I shall have something to say concerning the picturesque groups of diplomats from Asia, and from the various republican governments of Central and South America.

A GREAT WOMAN

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: II. Kings 4: 8, ...

Elisha passed to Shunem, where was a great woman

THE hotel of our time had no counterpart in any entertainment of olden time. The vast majority of travelers must then be entertained at private abode. Here comes Elisha, a servant of the Lord, on a divine mission, and he must find shelter. A balcony overlooking the valley of Esdraelon is offered him, in a private house, and it is especially furnished for his occupancy—a chair to sit on, a table from which to eat, a candlestick by which to read, and a bed on which to slumber, the whole establishment belonging to a great and good woman. Her husband, it seems, was a godly man, but he was entirely overshadowed by his wife's excellences; just as now you sometimes find in a household the wife the centre of dignity and influence and power, not by any arrogance or presumption, but by superior intellect and force of moral nature wielding domestic affairs and at the same time supervising all financial and business affairs. The wife's hand on the shuttle, or the banking-house, or the worldly business. You see hundreds of men who are successful only because there is a reason at home why they are successful. If a man marry a good, honest soul, he makes his fortune. If he marry a fool, the Lord help him! The wife may be the silent partner in the firm, there may be only masculine voices down on Exchange, but there oftentime comes from the home-circle a potential and elevating influence. This woman of my text was the superior of her husband. He, as far as I can understand, was what we often see in our day, a man of large fortune and only a modicum of brain, intensely quiet, sitting a long while in the same place without moving hand or foot, if you say "Yes," responding "Yes"; if you say "No," responding "No"—inane, eyes half-shut, mouth wide open, maintaining his position in society only because he has a large patrimony. But his wife, my text says, was a great woman. Her name has not come down to us. She belonged to that collection of people who need no name to distinguish them. What would title of duchess, or princess, or queen—what would escutcheon or gleaming diadem be to this woman of my text, who, by her intelligence and her behavior, challenges the admiration of all ages? Long after the brilliant women of the court of Louis XV. have been forgotten, and the brilliant women of the court of Spain have been forgotten, and the brilliant women who sat on the throne of Russia have been forgotten, some grandfather will put on his spectacles, and holding the book the other side the light, read to his grandchildren the story of this great woman of Shunem who was so kind and courteous and Christian to the good prophet Elisha. Yes, she was a great woman.

In the first place, she was great in her hospitalities. Uncivilized and barbarous nations have this virture. Jupiter had the surname of the Hospitable, and he was said especially to avenge the wrongs of strangers. Homer extolled it in his verse. The Arabs are punctilious on this subject, and among some of their tribes it is not until the ninth day of tarrying that the occupant has a right to ask his guest "Who and whence art thou?" If this virtue is so honored among barbarians, how ought it to be honored among those of us who believe in the Bible, which commands us to use hospitality one toward another without grudging?

Of course, I do not mean under this cover to give any idea that I approve of that vagrant class who go around from place to place, ranging their whole lifetime, perhaps, under the auspices of some benevolent or philanthropic society, quartering themselves on Christian families with a great pile of trunks in the hall and carpet bag portentous of tarrying. There is many a country parsonage that looks out week by week upon the ominous arrival of wagon with creaking wheel and lank horse and dilapidated driver, come under the auspices of some charitable institution to spend a few weeks and canvass the neighborhood. Let no such religious tramps take advantage of this beautiful virtue of Christian hospitality. Not so much the sumptuousness of your diet and the regality of your abode will impress the friend or the stranger that steps across your threshold, as the warmth of your greeting, the informality of your reception, the reiteration by grasp, and by look, and by a thousand attentions, insignificant attentions, of your earnestness of welcome. There will be high appreciation of your welcome, though you have nothing but the brazen candlestick and the plain chair to offer Elisha when he comes to Shunem. Most beautiful is this grace of hospitality when shown in the house of God. I am thankful that I have always been pastor of churches where strangers are welcome. But I have entered churches where there was no hospitality. A stranger would stand in the vestibule for awhile and then make a pilgrimage up the long aisle. No door opened to him until, flushed and excited and embarrassed, he started back again, and coming to some half-filled pew, with apologetic air, entered it, while the occupant glared on him with a look which seemed to say, "Well, if I must, I must." Away with such accursed indecency from the house of God. Let every church that would maintain large Christian influence in community culture Sabbath by Sabbath this beautiful grace of Christian hospitality.

A good man traveling in the far West, in the wilderness, was overtaken by night and storm, and he put in at a cabin. He saw firearms along the beams of the cabin and he felt alarmed. He did not know but that he had fallen into a den of thieves. He sat there greatly perturbed. After a while the man of the house came home with a gun on his shoulder and set it down in a corner. The stranger was still more alarmed. After a while the man of the house whispered with his wife, and the stranger thought his destruction was being planned. Then the man of the house came forward and said to the stranger: "Stranger, we are a rough and rude people out here, and we work hard for a living. We make our living by hunting, and when we come to the nightfall we are tired and we are apt to go to bed early, and before retiring we are always in the habit of reading a chapter from the Word of God and making a prayer. If you don't like such things, if you will just step outside the door until we get through, I'll be greatly obliged to you." Of course the stranger tarried in the room, and the old hunter took hold of the horns of the altar and brought down the blessing of God upon his household and upon the stranger within their gates. Rude but glorious Christian hospitality!

Again, this woman of my text was great in her kindness toward God's messenger. Elisha may have been a stranger in that household, but as she found out he had come on a divine mission, he was cordially welcomed. We have a great many books in our day about the hardships of ministers and the trials of Christian ministers. I wish somebody would write a book about the joys of the Christian minister, about the sympathies all around about him, about the kindness, about the genial considerations of him. Does sorrow come to our home, and is there a shadow on the cradle, there are hundreds of hands to help, and many who weary not through the night watching, and hundreds of prayers going up that God would restore the sick. Is there a burning, brimming cup of calamity placed on the pastor's table; are there not many to help him drink of that cup and who will not be comforted because he is stricken? Oh! for somebody to write a book about the rewards of the Christian ministry—about his surroundings of Christian sympathy. This woman of the text was only a type of thousands of men and women who come down from mansion and from cot to do kindness to the Lord's servants. I could tell you of something that you might think a romance. A young man graduated from New Brunswick Theological Seminary was called to a village church. He had not the means to furnish the parsonage. After three or four weeks of preaching a committee of the officers of the church waited on him and told him he looked tired and thought he had better take a vacation of a few days. The young pastor took it as an intimation that his work was done or not acceptable. He took the vacation, and at the end of a few days came back, when an old elder said: "Here is the key of the parsonage. We have been cleaning it up. You had better go up and look at it." So the young pastor took the key, went up to the parsonage, opened the door, and lo! it was carpeted, and there was the hat-rack all ready for the canes and the umbrellas and the overcoats, and on the left hand of the hall was the parlor, sofaed, chaired, pictured. He passed on to the other side of the hall, and there was the study-table in the centre of the floor with stationery upon it, book-shelves built, long ranges of new volumes; far beyond the reach of the means of the young pastor, many of these volumes. The young pastor went up-stairs, and found all the sleeping apartments furnished: came down-stairs and entered the pantry, and there were the spices, and the coffees and the sugars, and the groceries for six months. He went down into the cellar, and there was the coal for all the coming winter. He went into the dining-hall, and there was the table already set—the glass and the silverware. He went into the kitchen, and there were all the culinary implements and a great stove. The young pastor lifted one lid of the stove and he found the fuel all ready for ignition. Putting back the cover of the stove, he saw in another part of it a lucifer match, and all that young man had to do in starting to keep house was to strike the match. You tell me that is apocryphal. Oh no! that was my own experience. Oh! the kindnesses. Oh! the enlarged sympathies sometimes clustering around those who enter the Gospel ministry. I suppose the man of Shunem had to pay the bills, but it was the large hearted Christian sympathies of the woman of Shunem that looked after the Lord's messenger.

Again, this woman of the text was great in her behavior under trouble. Her only son had died on her lap. A very bright light went out in that household. The sacred writer puts it very tersely when he says: "He sat on her knee until noon and then he died." Yet the writer goes on to say that she exclaimed: "It is well!" Great in prosperity, this woman was great in trouble.

Where are the feet that have not been blistered on the hot sands of this great Sahara? Where are the soldiers that have not bent under the burden of grief? Where is the ship sailing over glassy sea that has not after awhile been caught in a cyclone? Where is the garden of earth ly comfort but trouble hath hitched up its fiery and panting team, and gone through it with burning plowshare of disaster? Under the pelting of ages of suffering the great heart of the world has burst with woe. Navigators tell us about the rivers, and the Amazon, and the Danube, and the Mississippi have been explored: but who can tell the depth or the length of the great river of sorrow, made up of tears and blood, rolling through all lands and all ages, bearing the wreck of families, and of communities, and of empires, foaming, writhing, boiling with the agonies of six thousand years. Etna, Cotopaxi and Vesuvius have been described, but who has ever sketched the volcano of suffering retching [illegible] and pouring them down the sides to [illegible] I could gather all the heartstrings, the broken heartstrings, into a harp, I would play on it a dirge such as was never sounded. Mythologists tell us of Gorgon and Centaur and Titan, and geologists tell us of [illegible] than Gorgon or Megatherium, and not belonging to the realm of fable, and not of an extinct species, a monster with an iron jaw and a hundred iron hoofs has walked across the nations, and history and poetry and sculpture, in their attempt to sketch it and describe it, have seemed to sweat great drops of blood. But thank God there are those who can conquer as this woman of the text conquered, and say, "It is well: though my property be gone, though my children be gone, though my home be broken up, though my health be sacrificed, it is well, it is well." There is no storm on the sea but Christ is ready to rise in the hinder part of the ship and hush it. There is no darkness but the constellation of God's eternal love can illumine it, and though the winter comes out of the northern sky, you have sometimes seen that northern sky all ablaze with auroras which seem to say, "Come up this way: up this way are thrones of light and seas of sapphire and the splendor of an eternal heaven. Come up this way."

We may, like the ships, by tempest be tossed
[illegible]
Though Satan enrage the wind and the tide
The promise assures us, the Lord will provide.

Again, this woman of my text was great in her application to domestic duties. Every picture is a home picture, whether she is entertaining an Elisha, or whether she is giving careful attention to her sick boy, or whether she is appealing for the restoration of her property. Every picture in her case is one of domesticity. Those are not disciples of this Shunemite woman who, going out to attend to outside charities, neglect the duty of home—the duty of wife, of mother, of daughter. No faithfulness in public benefaction can ever atone for domestic negligence. There has been many a mother who by indefatigable toil has reared a large family of children, equipping them for the duties of life with good manners and large intelligence and Christian principle, starting them out, who has done more for the world than many a woman whose name has sounded through all the lands and through the centuries. I remember when Kossuth was in this country, there were some ladies who got honorable reputations by presenting him very gracefully with bouquets of flowers on public occasions: but what was all that compared with the plain Hungarian mother who gave to truth and civilization and the cause of universal liberty a Kossuth? Yes, this woman of my text was great in her simplicity. When this prophet wanted to reward her for her hospitality by asking some preferment from the king, what did she say? She declined it. She said: "I dwell among my own people," as much as to say, "I am satisfied with my lot: all I want is my family and my friends around me; I dwell among my own people."

Oh! what a rebuke to the strife for precedence in all ages! How many there are who want to get great architecture, and homes furnished with all art, all painting, all statuary, who have not enough taste to distinguish between Gothic and Byzantine, and who could not tell a figure in plaster of-paris from Palmer's "White Captive," and would not know a boy's penciling from Bierstadt's "Yosemite." Men who buy large libraries by the square foot, buying these libraries when they have scarcely enough education to pick out the day of the month in the almanac! Oh, how many there are striving to have things as well as their neighbors, or better than their neighbors: and in the struggle vast fortunes are exhausted and business firms thrown into bankruptcy, and men of reputed honesty rush into astounding forgeries. Of course, I say nothing against refinement or culture. Splendor of abode, sumptuousness of diet, lavishness in art, neatness in apparel—there is nothing against them in the Bible or out of the Bible. God does not want us to prefer mud hovel to English cottage, or untanned sheepskin to French broadcloth, or husks to pineapple, or the clumsiness of a boor to the manners of a gentleman. God, who strung the beach with tinted shell, and the grass of the field with the dews of the night, and hath exquisitely tinged morning cloud and robin-redbreast, wants us to keep our eye open to all beautiful sights, and our ear open to all beautiful cadences, and our heart open to all elevating sentiments.

But what I want to impress upon you, my hearers, is that you ought not to inventory the luxuries of life among the indispensables, and you ought not to depreciate this woman of the text, who, when offered kingly preferment, responded: "I dwell among my own people." Yea, this woman of the text was great in her piety. Just read the chapter after you go home. Faith in God, and she was not ashamed to talk about it before idolaters. Ah! woman will never appreciate what she owes to Christianity until she knows and sees the degradation of her sex under paganism and Mohammedanism. Her very birth considered a misfortune. Sold like cattle on the shambles. Slave of all work, and, at last, her body fuel for the funeral pyre of her husband. Above the shriek of the fire-worshipers in India, and above the rumbling of the Juggernauts, I hear the million-voiced groan of wronged, insulted, broken-hearted, down-trodden woman. Her tears have fallen in the Nile and Tigris, the La Plata, and on the steppes of Tartary. She has been dishonored in Turkish garden and Persian palace and Spanish Alhambra. Her little ones have been sacrificed in the Indus and the Ganges. There is not a groan, or a dungeon, or an island, or a mountain, or a river, or a lake, or a sea but could tell a story of the outrages heaped upon her. But thanks to God this glorious Christianity comes forth, and all the chains of this vassalage are snapped, and she rises from ignominy to exalted sphere and becomes the affectionate daughter, the gentle wife, the honored mother, the useful Christian. Oh! if Christianity has done so much for woman, surely woman will become its most ardent advocate and its sublimest exemplification.

THE GOSPEL IN PORTO RICO

It will be good news to all who are interested in the work of evangelizing and educating the natives of Porto Rico, to learn that Gen. John Eaton, ex-United States Commissioner of Education, sailed last week on a highly important mission to that island. He has been specially invited by the Insular Cabinet, and acting under the authority of our Government, proceeds to San Juan to organize and personally supervise a system of education which shall meet the needs of the population. The choice has the fullest approval of the Commanding General of the American forces in the island of Porto Rico. In view of General Eaton's life-long familiarity with educational methods, the appointment is an eminently suitable one.

While engaged in this educational work, Gen. Eaton will have ample facilities for surveying the field and investigating the opportunjties presented for various forms of Christian work, and more especially for the establishment of Sunday Schools at San Juan, Ponce and Mayaguez. We hope to have from him a full report on these matters at an early date, and also to have his co-operation in the opening stages of the work, at least. His letters will be published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

RELIGION IN CUBA AND PORTO RICO

Decline of the Spanish State Church—Only one poor Protestant Church in Eastern Cuba amid a multitude of Catholic Cathedrals—Religious tolerance now the rule for all

DOWN in Santiago de Cuba, on Calle Enramadas, a few blocks from the Government Palace, is a one-story adobe building, fronted by the usual roofed veranda. The house is of crude construction, and there is nothing in its external appearance different from that of its neighbors. On certain evenings in the week, and on Sundays, the passerby will hear the tuneful notes of old familiar hymns floating from the open, wooden-barred windows, but there is a certain discord in the notes as if the voices are wandering over new paths. And the language is not English, but the softer tongue of the Latin races.

THE ONLY PROTESTANT CHURCH IN SANTIAGO DE CUBA

This building, which stands side by side with shops and private residences, which has neither cross nor spire to mark its mission, which, usassuming and lowly, fronts the narrow thoroughfare, is the first and only Protestant church inaugurated in the eastern capital of the Island of Cuba—Santiago. It has neither nave nor vestry; its parsonage is a small room off the church proper, and its seating capacity will not exceed a hundred; yet it represents in that city of over fifty thousand souls the only place where the Protestant can worship.

It is more than that, however. It is the first drop of the coming flood of religious enlightenment, the first crumb of the fall of religious manna now hovering over the islands of Cuba and Porto Rico, and for that reason, if no other, the little adobe building will prove of lasting interest to the Christian world.

It is one of eleven churches in Santiago—the others are part and parcel of the Spanish State church. Almost within a stone's throw of it will be found the Cathedral, a massive, gray, gloomy pile occupying an eminence which raises it above the other buildings of the city. The two—the modest Protestant mission and the great, formidable, impressive Cathedral—typify the flow and the ebb, the beginning and the end of two religions in that part of the Island of Cuba.

The defeat of Spain is proving a sore blow to the Church in the West Indies. It was built up by four centuries of hard, tireless labor, and it has reached that point where comfort and prosperity and success come as a reward for work thoroughly done. The power of the Church was supreme. It had been uplifted from the uncertain niche of support, by voluntary contribution, to the complacent and satisfactory platform represented by a permanent place in the annual State budget. It was, in fact, at the very top notch of its greatness. Then came the decline, fast following after defeat.

The success of American arms has brought into being a rather peculiar state of affairs in both Cuba and Porto Rico. It has placed the church upon the horns of a puzzling dilemma. Its source of income is entirely cut off. Impoverished Spain can no longer support it, and probably would not if it could, and the natives of Cuba and Porto Rico, with very few exceptions, are so indifferent to it that contributions, either large or small, are absolutely impossible. To-day, the majority of the inhabitants of Cuba are thoroughly antagonistic to the church of Rome.

This is also true of the natives of Porto Rico. The same condition of affairs, though in a less degree, obtained there. In fact, in that island, the local head of the church speedily realized that he could hope for nothing in the shape of financial support from the people after Spain's authority ceased, and he promptly took ship for home. The Bishop of Santiago de Cuba, made of sterner stuff, has held on with a hope that he can do something with the American government.

Recently, he craved audience with General Leonard Wood, the Military and Civil Governor, and asked that his church be given some support from the new regime. He stated frankly that his subordinates and the various religious orders were in want of the necessities of life, and that the native population had absolutely refused to contribute a penny. His request was forwarded to Washington. It is safe to predict, from now on, the Catholic Church in Cuba and Porto Rico will, to use a homely phrase, "stand on its own bottom," like the churches of other denominations.

In all Latin-American countries, the Catholic Church, in its buildings and ceremonies, seeks to impress the minds of the native worshipers. This fact is very patent in both Cuba and Porto Rico. The church edifices there are all built after the same general architectural plan. The great cathedrals in Havana, Santiago, San Juan and Ponce are different from the churches in the smaller towns only in size and display of wealth. The structures are built of adobe, or sun-dried bricks. The walls are massive, often exceeding six feet in thickness. There are the usual arrangement of bell towers, and, in most cases, a gilded dome rises from the centre of the roof. From an artistic point of view, the architecture of the doors and windows is disappointing, but whenever possible, the churches are built in front of a plaza, or small square, so that whatever dignity the buildings may possess, space is given to view it.

It is in the interior arrangements that the ingenuity of the designers find free scope. Every Catholic church contains one vast apartment which extends from the ground to the groined roof. Its very loftiness is impressive, and impressiveness is the fundamental principle. Warm colors, save that of gold, are not used. Pure white prevails, with here and there a touch of darker shades. This is true in the general body of the church, but in the "stations" as they are called, and in the smaller side altars, scarlet and red and purple and gold run riot.

There are no seats save a bench or two in out-of-the-way corners. The great, tiled floor is bare from the entrance door to the altar. The devout kneel on entering, and remain in that position with bowed heads during the entire service. Those who can afford it are accompanied to mass by a servant who carries a rug or embroidered cushion, in some cases even a light cane chair, for the comfort of their employer. In Cuba and Porto Rico fully nine-tenths of the congregations are composed of women. The men seldom attend save on the more important feast-days.

At each service confessions are heard. The confessionals are mere wooden boxes, or open stalls, placed against the wall. They have a square, grated aperture in each of the two sides, beneath which is a narrow cushioned ledge upon which the penitent kneels. The confessions are generally heard by a cowled, rough-robed monk, a member of one of the many orders.

At high mass the music is always fine, it being the habit in Havana to employ the regular theatrical orchestra. Black is the prevailing color of the garments worn, save by the younger children. And seldom can a bonnet be found except on the heads of strangers.

Our war with Spain will cause wondrous changes in the church of our new possessions. And one of the greatest will be the organization of real religious tolerance—a phrase which has been a by-word there for many, many centuries.

CHRIST AT JACOB'S WELL

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 29. John 4: 5-15
Golden Text, John 5: 14

AFTER his interview with Nicodemus, our Lord left Jerusalem for the country districts, where he tarried with his disciples and baptized. John's disciples could not accept that the ministry of their master should pass out of his hands, even though it were into the hands of him to whom John had borne witness. But John understood it, and willed nothing better than that Jesus should increase and he himself decrease (John 3: 22-30). How little can the world, or even ordinary Christians, understand the intense joy of taking a low place, becoming nothing and nobody that our Lord may be gainer! Our human nature is so self-sufficient that we begin by thinking that our ministry and influence is indispensable to the cause of our Lord, and that in asserting ourselves in our work for him, we are glorifying God. It is only the Holy Spirit who can teach us what he taught the loyal forerunner of our Lord.

The ministry of our Lord, however, was attracting notice in other quarters: the Pharisees had heard of it, and therefore, not on account of John and his disciples, Jesus left Judea and departed again into Galilee (John 4: 3). His movements were always regulated from above, and according to the leading of his Father who was with him, and never left him alone. He must needs pass through Samaria. Coming to a Samarian city named Sychar, he sat down on the well known as Jacob's well, he being weary with the long journey. But in his fully surrendered human life, work and rest were equally an offering to his Father; both regulated by his will, both freely at his disposal, to be interrupted when he would. O how different is a God-regulated life to a self-regulated life! When we obey self-made laws, or come under law to man, we are always in bondage, not free for God.

His Father had given him the quiet rest on the well while his disciples went into the city to buy food. His Father had a right to interrupt it. A woman of Samaria came to draw water. Have not many of us, when we have made a plan to get a little rest and quiet alone with God, been tempted to fret at an unexpected interruption? Not so with Jesus. This woman could not have come at this moment unless his Father had permitted it. And, led from above, he addressed her. "Give me to drink." "How is it that thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me, which am a woman of Samaria?" was the reply, "for the Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans." But he to whom she spoke had other thoughts than the disputes between Jews and Samaritans. He was infinitely above these party questions: the interests of his father and the relation of men to him lay on the heart of the Son of Man.

"If thou knewest the gift of God, and who it is that saith to thee, give me to drink, thou wouldest have asked of him, and he would have given thee living water." Did this woman know the Scriptures sufficiently to be aware of that title of Israel's God, "The fountain of living waters" revealed to them by Jeremiah, the prophet (Jer. 2: 13; 17: 13)? If she did she had no understanding of divine things, for she replied entirely on earthly lines. "Sir, thou hast nothing to draw with, and the well is deep: from whence then hast thou that living water? Art thou greater than our father, Jacob, which gave us the well, and drank thereof himself, and his children, and his cattle?" Again the great Teacher answers her earthly conceptions by truth on heavenly lines. "Whosoever drinketh of this water shall thirst again: but whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him, shall never thirst: but the water that I shall give him shall be in him a well of water, springing up into everlasting life."

Do we know the power of this living water springing up continually within us? Certainly this is not the description of such so-called believers as have never a word to speak for Jesus, and have lips closed when others around them are praying together. Where is "the well of water springing up" in those who cannot maintain their spiritual life without perpetually living like parasites on the spiritual vitality of other Christians? Where is "the well of water springing up" in the hearts of those who, not satisfied with Jesus, must need seek in the amusements of the world to fill a void which Jesus does not fill? When Jesus spoke of the living water, it is expressly added, "This spake he of the Spirit which they that believe on him should receive." Miserable conversion where sin goes out, and yet the Holy Spirit does not come in to dwell and to spring up into everlasting life! Miserable conversion where sin is forgiven, but where the whole being is not given over to the indwelling Spirit of God!

"Sir, give me this water that I thirst not, neither come all the way hither to draw," was the ignorant, yet earnest, reply of the Samaritan woman. How little she understood the consequences of the words she spoke! But she had committed herself. She believed Jesus had something to give: she had made a personal application for it. He would give, not according to what she was, or according to her limited and altogether erroneous conceptions. He would give, as he ever does to a true petitioner, according to what he was. How little that woman expected when she made her petition that the dragging out of the deep sin of her past and present life would be involved! There is no lasting healing until the wound of sin is probed to its very source.

JESUS TALKING TO THE WOMAN OF SAMARIA AT THE WELL

LESSON POINTS

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers

OUR wonder at this talk with the woman of Samaria is as great as that of the woman, herself. When we think of what Christ was and of the stupendous character of his mission, we are amazed that he should condescend to talk with such as she, and that to her he should have made the frank disclosure that he did not make to the great and learned men with whom he came in contact. When this ignorant, vicious woman mentioned the Messiah, Jesus frankly said: "I that speak unto thee am he." The wonderful tact and delicacy Jesus showed throughout the conversation are very beautiful. He allows the woman to lead the talk, yet he ever turns it from the material to the spiritual, from the general to the personal. She is surprised that a Jew should ask a favor of a Samaritan. He does not apologize, but tells her of an opportunity she is missing. He could give living water. The woman does not perceive his meaning, and brings the talk back to the well. Jesus tells her more in detail what the water is that he could give. Still she thinks he is talking of ordinary water, and that he was merely offering to save her labor. A vivid flash of prophetic [illegible] its shameful details. At once she is impressed with her interlocutor's powers; but the subject is too painful, and, with true feminine dexterity, she turns the conversation to a doctrinal question, about which she could talk without self-reproach. Jesus perceives her motive, but does not resent it. He tells her that mere places of worship are not important; it is knowledge, and sincerity of spirit in the worshiper that are essential to true worship. Then seeing that the woman is more in earnest than her talk shows, he reveals himself, and the woman forgetting her waterpot and all else, goes to her neighbors to fetch them to him.

[illegible] That was true at the time, and we learn [illegible] that there was a reason for the antipathy. Even to a woman of the alien race, and not a good woman at that, he was ready to reveal himself, and she proved a more receptive hearer than those of the privileged race. In a certain church the question arose of whether it was better to have separate seats or pews. An aristocratic member of the church warmly advocated the separate seats. He said: "In a pew I might find myself seated next to my own coachman." The minister, who knew the coachman, replied: "And what then? Perhaps you will be glad if in the next world you will find yourself seated beside him."

Living water. As a famous preacher says, it makes a great deal of difference into what well we let down our bucket. There is water that will support us under all circumstances, and some that is good only in prosperity. Dr. Banks tells the story of two merchants who lived side by side on the same street. Both were prosperous, but one was a Christian, and the other was not. In a commercial panic, both went down, and at fifty years of age had to begin life again. The merchant who was not a Christian, promptly committed suicide. The other, with unfaltering faith in God, never let go the peace that passes understanding. He obtained a position as clerk, moved into cheap apartments, and began his hard struggle for bread. He kept his place in the church and none could ever tell that he endured hardships, for his soul remained full of the peace which God alone can give.

If thou knewest. This woman had no idea that the weary traveler sitting on the well was different from others. Nor at this day, do men realize how near God is to them, nor how willing he is to impart the blessing they need. The story is told of a ship which had been buffeted by storms and driven out of her course. The crew had been toiling night and day and were almost worn out. They had not been able to make any port to renew their supply of water, and they were almost perishing of thirst. They hailed a passing ship with the cry: "Water, water, give us some water!" The answer was: "Let down your buckets and get all you want. You are in fresh water." They were on the Amazon, and did not know it.

He would have given thee. We often miss our opportunities in life. The story is told of a European who had been seized and imprisoned by an Abyssinian king. He was allowed to go at large, but a heavy iron fetter on each ankle kept him from making his escape. A European traveler saw and pitied him, but dared not openly help him, as he was watched by the king's officers. He was, however, allowed to give the captive a book. The poor prisoner was disappointed. He did not want books, and would have been much better pleased with a gift of food or clothing. The book was laid aside and forgotten. Three years afterwards, in an idle moment he examined the book. There was something hard in the back of it. He pulled it out, and behold, it was a file. It was the thing of all others he most needed. He made his way to the woods, and filed at his fetters hour after hour. In thirty-six hours he was free of them, and in a few days he had reached the coast and was safe from pursuit. He could not forgive himself for having endured those three years of slavery. If he had only looked in the book before, he might have been free. So men neglect the Bible, which would set them free from the slavery of sin.

PRINTED BY AFRICAN CONVERTS

Bishop Hartzell's New Missionary Enterprise in Liberia — A Native Missionary Journal — How Christian America can Help a Deserving Work

AMONG the foremost missionary workers of our own times, there is none more progressive and energetic than Rev. J. C. Hartzell, the Methodist Missionary Bishop of Africa. Since he assumed charge of the African missionary work, it has been advanced vigorously in every direction, and the mission stations in Liberia, Angola, Zambesia, and on the Congo, are now in more effective operation than at any period of their previous history. Souls are being brought into the Kingdom, and the number of converts is steadily increasing.

Especially is the progress marked in Liberia, where the good Bishop has labored most strenuously. His latest plan for furthering the spread of the Gospel in the little African Republic is the establishment of a mission press at Monrovia, the capital, the entire mechanical labor upon which is performed by young native converts. Within a few weeks he has shipped to Monrovia a press and outfit of type, which he purchased in New York with contributions given by American friends of the Gospel in Darkest Africa. This is the beginning of a great effort in an altogether new direction, and promises to be richly blessed as a most valuable aid to missionary effort.

Our photograph on this page shows a little group of colored men and women who have pledged their lives to the work of bringing their fellow-men and women in distant Africa into the knowledge of the truth. Rev. J. C. Sherrill and wife came from Little Rock, Ark., where Mr. Sherrill left a promising pastorate to enter the new field, feeling specially called to the work. Miss Davis comes from Pine Bluff, Ark., and is a trained missionary worker. Mr. Davis is a teacher. Mr. Allen is a young and well-trained printer, and will have special charge of the mechanical work connected with the production of The New Africa, Bishop Hartzell's new missionary publication, the first number of which was printed and issued in New York recently. The editorial work will be under the charge of the Bishop, aided by a competent staff.

"The entire printing outfit," Bishop Hartzell explained to the writer, "including a cylinder press and job press, and type enough to produce the paper, and to do general job work, are all on the sea on their way to Africa. This is really a great undertaking. I have received $850 in contributions toward the press outfit; and any further gifts from friends of Gospel work in Africa, will be promptly used in paying the rest of the expense. I shall need fully $2,000 more to put this matter in shape. Will it not be a fine thing to have a paper, printed and illustrated by the native boys of the college of West Africa and sent out to the world? Yet, that is just what we are undertaking.

"The New Africa as a monthly publication dates its birth from New York, and Monrovia, Africa. Strange, indeed, two birthplaces, and they separated by oceans and continents! But nothing is strange after it is explained. My conviction was clear during my first visit in Liberia that a mission press, including a monthly paper, was one of the necessary things for the work of God in that republic; to say nothing of the value of such a publication for our work in other sections of Africa. That conviction was approved by the Missionary Board."

An enthusiastic missionary and farewell meeting was held in St. Mark's Church, New York, on the eve of the departure of the little band of workers who are to form the advance guard of the new Gospel effort in Liberia. Bishop Hartzell presided, and in the course of his opening address said:

I have spent two months in the Republic of Liberia, going up and down its coast, studying the difficulties both among the Americo-Liberians and among the native heathen. I came to understand some of the difficulties of that field, and when these people start from America to Liberia to give their lives to missionary work as ministers and teachers, they go to no ordinary responsibilities. If any missionaries in the world should have the profound sympathy and prayers of the church, they are the missionaries who go to labor on the west coast of Africa.

Liberia has come to be one of the most interesting spots in Africa. It is a republic fashioned after our own, and is made up largely of colored people, who have gone from America, and their descendants—about twenty-five thousand. There they have built towns and centres of business; there they have accomplished great things under difficult circumstances; and although the republic is not as prosperous as many hoped it would be, I am here to express a profound sympathy for these people in their struggles in building up civilization on that continent. Outside of these twenty-five thousand Americo-Liberians who speak English, there are a few thousand civilized natives from the Kroo, Vey, Grebo and other tribes, and outside of these there are a full million of barbarous native heathen in the republic, and beyond all these are the vast multitudes in the great continent who have never heard the Gospel. To those who are with us and others who are to follow, we say, Go forth to that land, and win the field through the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

In a few days I will sail from this country and again go over these fields, not to return until 1900. It would be interesting for me to tell all my experiences, but we are here to centre our thoughts and prayers on Liberia. To-night we are beginning a new epoch in the history of Liberia. These people who go out are graduates of our best schools—and they go as a sort of advance guard of thousands of educated black men and women who are to go in the future. We have already sent some black people who have made excellent teachers, among them Brother Camphor and wife. We are to witness to-night the largest party of black missionaries who ever at one time left this land for Africa.

I have many letters from young colored men and women who want to go to Africa. And no one thing has done so much to convince me that God has called me to this work in Africa as the hearty co-operation of the colored people. When I was elected in 1896, I received scores of letters from people in the South. They said, "You go to Africa; we know you, and when you return and tell us there is a place for us to work we will follow you." I could have a hundred missionaries to accompany me, as well as these six, if I had had the means and thought it safe to do so. I want to say this to the honor of the black people of the South. I want to say that the Methodist Episcopal Church, the largest Protestant Church in the world, and the church which has the largest number of black people in its ranks who are organically a part of it, has taken the lead in this work. I believe that out from the 300,000 black communicants we have in this Church, and the 1,000,000 colored people we have back of them in our schools and congregations, will come the evangelizing force that will hasten the redemption of Africa.

Short addresses were also delivered by several of the outgoing missionaries, and by Rev. W. H. Brooks, the pastor of St. Mark's Church.

There are, doubtless, many readers of this journal, who would deem it a privilege to have a share in this new effort to evangelize Africa, through the medium of a native mission press. To all who are so inclined, and who may forward their contributions for that purpose to this journal, Bishop Hartzell will send his personal acknowledgment of the gifts. To contributors of one dollar and upward, he will, in addition, send The New Africa for one year free by mail.

Soul-saving in the Slums

Superintendent S. S. Hadley, of the old McAuley Water Street Mission, New York, writes us as follows:

I wish to have your CHRISTIAN HERALD readers, who have helped us so kindly in the past, know that we are still alive and in a glorious fight against Satan for the poor and helpless drunkard, the thief and the outcast. The old Mission is a great place for men who have been discharged from prison. Many have come to us for some weeks past, and a number have been converted and are leading useful lives. Christmas we fed 600 hungry men and women. Three hundred men, all drunkards and criminals, have professed saving faith in Christ here since September last.

GOD'S ARMY

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Jan. 29. Ps. 20:1-9

WAR is always repugnant to the Christian. There are extreme circumstances which justify it, as when we have to defend our country and our loved ones against an invader, or when we interfere to deliver the oppressed from the oppressor. There are some men and some potentates who can be curbed and restrained only by force. It is useless to argue with them because they cannot be convinced by argument. It is useless to prove to the burglar that it is wrong to steal. He knows it is wrong, but he does not care. So we oppose force to force, and employ a policeman, whom we arm with club and revolver, to subdue the burglar, and carry him off to prison. But that is not the ideal condition of society. We look forward to a time when it will be unnecessary to use force. When men are so transformed that they recognize the eternal principles of right and justice, they will yield to moral suasion. We are on our way to such a time, and have made distinct progress toward it. In olden times, when a charge was made against a man in the circle of nobility, he and his accuser met and fought a duel, and it often happened that the guilty man was the victor. The duel proved nothing as to the guilt or innocence of the accused man, but only which of the two was the better fighter. Now, we carry the charge into the courts and have the facts stated before impartial men, who decide on the merits of the case. Perhaps the time will come when kings and governments will have to adopt the same methods and lay aside the sword forever, as a method of settling quarrels.

But that time will not bring an end to conflicts. It will raise them to a higher plane. There will still be a need for God's army in the earth. It will still be necessary for men to stand together and contend for the principles of righteousness. Desire for gain, and pleasure and self-indulgence are potent principles in the human breast, and it is always possible in a community that men who are swayed by those principles will be in the majority. Thus the saloon is protected for the sake of the revenue it brings, and evil resorts are allowed to exist because of the influence of the men who patronize them. God's army has plenty of work before it. It is composed of men of all denominations who love right and truth and are valiant in contending for goodness. In municipal government, in the business world, in the factory and home, such men are needed. Everywhere the conflict rages between the principles of good and evil, and recruits are needed for the army of God. The old leaders die, the ranks are thinned, and there is always a danger of temporary defeat. There is need of active enlistment and of the drill sergeant who will train the recruits for the battle.

How may we best promote the strength of the army? One means is to let it be always clear on which side we stand. There ought never to be any doubt as to a Christian's colors. His conduct ought to be such as to convince all who come in contact with him of his allegiance. He ought not only to be registered on his church roll, but to be known by his walk and conversation. Another means is the spirit of comradery. There are many regiments in God's army, but the army is one. There ought to be no jealousy between the divisions. Every soldier who enlists under the banner of the Great Captain is a brother and comrade of every other. The battle is so fierce that every man is needed on the side of righteousness. We cannot afford to hold aloof from any man, even though he belong to another division. All should work together, and each, as he struggles in his respective way, should be sure of the sympathy of the others.

An Entire Bible

A MAN must consent to be laughed at if he believes the Scriptures. Some one says: "You don't now really believe all the story of the Garden of Eden, do you?" Yes, as much as I believe there were roses in the garden last summer. "But," they say, "you don't really believe that the sun and moon stood still?" Yes, and if I had strength enough to create a sun and moon I could make them stand still, or cause the refraction of the sun's rays so they would appear so to do. "But," they say, "you don't really believe that the whale swallowed Jonah?" Yes, and if I were strong enough to make a whale, I could have made very easy ingress for the refractory prophet, leaving to evolution to eject him if he were an unworthy tenant! "But," say they, "you don't really believe that the water was turned into wine?" Yes, just as easily as water now is often turned into wine with an admixture of chemicals and dyestuffs! "But," say they, "you don't really believe that Samson slew a thousand with the jawbone of an ass?" Yes, and I think that the man who in this day assaults the Bible is wielding the same weapon! There is nothing in the Bible that staggers me. There are many things I do not understand, I do not pretend to understand, never shall in this world understand. But that would be a very poor God who could be fully understood by the human. That would be a very small infinite that could be measured by the finite. You must not expect to weigh the thunderbolts of omnipotence in an apothecary's balances. Starting with the idea that God can do anything, and that he was present at the beginning, and that he is present now, there is nothing in the Holy Scriptures to arouse scepticism in my heart. On this position, I stand, a fossil of the ages, dug up from the tertiary formation, fallen off the shelf of an antiquarian, a man in the latter part of the glorious nineteenth century, believing in a whole Bible from lid to lid!

Some say there are things in the Bible unfit to be read. Now I have to say that if a man is shocked with what he calls the indelicacies of the Word of God, he is prurient in his taste and imagination. If a man cannot read the book of Solomon's Song without impure suggestion, he is either in his heart or in his life a libertine. The Old Testament description of wickedness, uncleanness of all sorts, is purposely and righteously a disgusting account, instead of the Byronic and the Parisian vernacular which makes sin attractive instead of appalling. When those old prophets point you to a lazaretto, it is a lazaretto. When a man, having begun to do right, falls back into wickedness and gives up his integrity, the Bible does not say he was overcome by the fascinations of the festal board, or that he surrendered to convivialities, or that he became a little fast in his habits. I will tell you what the Bible says. "The dog is turned to his own vomit again, and the sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire." No gilding of iniquity. No garlands on a death's-head. No pounding away with a silver mallet at iniquity, when it needs an iron sledge-hammer. I can easily understand how people brooding over the description of uncleanness in the Bible, may get morbid in mind, until they are as full of it as the wings and the beak and the nostril, and the claw of a buzzard are full of the odors of a carcass, but what is wanted is not that the Bible be disinfected, but that you, the critic, have your heart and mind washed with carbolic acid! I tell you, that a man who does not like this book, and who is critical as to its contents, and who is shocked and outraged with its descriptions, has never been soundly converted. The laying on of the hands of Presbytery or Episcopacy, does not change a man's heart, and men sometimes get into the pulpit, as well as into the pew, never having been changed radically by the sovereign grace of God. Get your heart right and the Bible will be right.

What About the Turf?

ALL over Christendom the question is often discussed whether Christian people ought to have any interest in the development of the speed of horses. There is a delusion afloat in the world that a thing must be necessarily good and Christian if it is slow and dull and plodding. There are very good people who seem to imagine it is humbly pious to drive a spavined, galled, glandered, springhalted, blind-staggered jade. There is not so much virtue in a Rosinante as there is in a Bucephalus. At the rate some people drive, Elijah with his horses of fire would have have taken three weeks to get into heaven. We want swifter horses and swifter men and swifter enterprises, and the Church of God needs to get off its jog-trot. Quick tempests, quick lightnings, quick streams, why not quick horses?

In time of war the cavalry service does the most execution, and as the battles of the world are probably not all past. Christian patriotism demands that we be interested in equinal velocity. We might as well have poorer guns in our arsenals and clumsier ships in our navy yards than other nations, as to have under our cavalry saddles and before our parks of artillery slower horses.

From the battle of Granicus, where the Persian horses drove the Macedonian infantry into the river, clear down to the horses on which Philip Sheridan and Stonewall Jackson rode into the fray, this arm of the military service has been recognized. Hamilcar, Hannibal, Gustavus Adolphus, Marshal Ney, were cavalrymen. In this arm of the service Charles Martel, at the battle of Poictiers, beat back the Arab invasion. The Carthaginian cavalry, with the loss of only seven hundred men, overthrew the Roman army with the loss of seven thousand. The best way to keep peace in this country and in all countries is to be prepared for war, and there is no success in such a contest unless there be plenty of light-footed chargers. Our Christian patriotism and our instruction from the Word of God demand that first of all we kindly treat the horse, and then after that we develop his fleetness and his grandeur and his majesty and his strength. But what shall I say of the effort being made in this day on a large scale to make this splendid creature of God, this divinely honored being, an instrument of atrocious evil? I make no indiscriminate assault against the turf. I believe in the turf if it can be conducted on right principles and with no betting. There is no more harm in offering a prize for the swiftest racer than there is harm at an agricultural fair in offering prizes to the farmer who has the best wheat, or to the fruit-grower who has the largest pear, or to the machinist who has the best corn-thresher, or in a school offering a prize of a copy of Shakespeare to the best reader, or in a household giving a lump of sugar to the best behaved youngster. Prizes by all means, rewards by all means. That is the way God develops the race.

Heaven itself is called a prize: "the prize of the high-calling of God in Christ Jesus." So what is right in one direction is right in another direction. And without the prize the horse's fleetness and beauty and strength will never be fully developed. If it cost $1,000, or $5,000, or $10,000, and the result be achieved, it is cheap. But the sin begins where the betting begins, for that is gambling, or the effort to get that for which you give no equivalent, and gambling, whether on a large scale or small scale, ought to be denounced of men as it will be accursed of God. If you have won fifty cents or $5,000 as a wager, you had better get rid of it. Get rid of it right away. Give it to some one who lost in a bet, or give it to some great reformatory institution, or if you do not like that, go down to the river and pitch it off the dock. You cannot afford to keep it. It will burn a hole in your purse, it will burn a hole in your estate, and you will lose all that, perhaps ten thousand times more—perhaps you will lose all. Gambling blasts a man or it blasts his children. Generally both and all.

Innocent Fun

WE want a very great deal more sunshine and fresh air in our theology as well as in our secular literature. The reformers of the world go into their studies, and they sit and they sit, and they study and they study, and they get morbid and bilious and they think everything is going to ruin. It is not going to ruin: it is going on to salvation: the purposes of God are fulfilling: and those of us who are the children of God are not on the way to a penitentiary but to a palace, and this world is not going to be all desert, it is going to be all garden.

We want more sunshine in our theology. How are you going to get people in the kingdom of God—drive them in? You cannot drive them in. How does the Word of God say they are to be got in? "I if I be lifted up will draw all men unto me." You cannot drive them in. So I wish that every Winter our ponds and lakes might be all aquake with the heel and the shout of the swift skater, and in warm weather I wish that the graceful oar might dip the stream, and the eventide be filled with the song of the boatman, the bright prow splitting the crystalline billow, so that men may come back with strength in the arm and lustre in the eye, and ruddiness in the cheek and more heroic courage in the heart.

In this great battle now opening against the powers of darkness there is need not only of a consecrated soul, but a strong arm, and stout lungs, and steady nerve, and healthful physique. I am glad there are recreations, some of them indoor, some of them outdoor, that are good for the body, good for the mind, good for the soul, and it is time that the Church of God woke up: instead of standing and saying all the time "Don't do this, and don't do that, and don't do the other thing," tell the people what they may do.

THE NEED OF THE HOUR

ONE of the great needs of the Church today is an army of men and women with a thorough knowledge of the [illegible] and a consuming desire for the salvation of men. Willing to go into the hard field (so called), and tell the grand old story of Jesus and his love, rather than [illegible] the day, and deliver them in an eloquent manner before a fashionable and worldly congregation. Men who believe God, rather than man. Men who believe the Bible from first to finish. Men who, because of their faith in God and his Word, can go to these islands of the sea that are being thrust upon us, and give to them the only light [illegible]

For years I have been laboring to this end, and it was for this purpose solely that the Bible Institute of Chicago was founded. It does not seek to compete with the theological institutions of the country, but has a distinctive object in view, viz.: That of teaching the [illegible] denominational, and the instructors are the best that can be obtained, regardless of their church affiliations. There are scores of men and women who have gone out from the Bible [illegible] doing valiant service for the Master, and hundreds more who are students at the present time.

But the fields are broadening, and doors are being opened on every hand, and the number of men who are prepared to do the work is wholly inadequate to supply the demand. The century is drawing to a close, and there are forty millions of non-church-goers in our country that should be reached. We have the buildings and we have the faculty, and with a little additional expense we could as well have a thousand or more men and women in training, as a few hundred. Is it not time, then, to "launch out into the deep," and to "cast the net on the other side?"

I desire through the co-operation of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers to greatly augment the number of persons during the present year, who are willing to go to the unchurched masses, and to reach out the hand of Christian fellowship to those who do not want to be reached, and thus in some measure to obey the Divine command to "go out into the highways and hedges, and compel them to come in." For particulars regarding course of study, practical work, etc., address Superintendent Bible Institute, 80 Institute Place, Chicago, Ill.

BRIEF NOTES

According to "The Jewish Year-Book" there are about eleven million Jews in the world, half of them under Russian jurisdiction.

The Wesleyan Centenary and Mission Hall in London fifty years ago cost $150,000. Its site alone, without the buildings, is now valued at $1,150,000.

Subscribers who have written us inquiring about a biography of the late George Muller will be glad to learn that Dr. A. T. Pierson is at work on such a book, and expects to publish it in about three months.

Dr. Jacob Chamberlain, the missionary, writing from India, gives this welcome news: "Our northeast Monsoon, though very late, has finally come in, and with a very fine rainfall, which dispells all fear of famine."

A contemporary says that in one Methodist school in China there are no less than fifty girls who had been thrown away by their parents to die in their infancy, but had been picked up by compassionate persons and taken to the school to be cared for by the missionaries.

Friends of Rev. J. Manton Smith, who recently visited many of our great cities during his evangelistic tour, will regret to hear that he has been obliged to undergo a serious surgical operation. Gangrene showed itself in one of his feet, and it was necessary to amputate it. Mr. Smith bore the operation well, but is still extremely weak.

The death of Rev. Moses D. Hoge, D. D., of Richmond, Va., is announced. He was one of the most eminent ministers of the Southern Presbyterian Church, and was widely known and revered in the North. He had been Pastor of the Second Presbyterian Church of Richmond for more than half a century. He was fully aware of the approach of death and shortly before the end, in reply to questions of reporters, dictated a beautiful pathetic statement of his feeling, in view of the coming change.

A meeting of prominent Christian business men was held on Jan. 11th, in the United Charities Building, New York, to take into consideration the proposal of holding an Ecumenical Conference on Foreign Missions in the year 1900. Among the distinguished men interested in the movement whose names appeared on the call were Gen. O. O. Howard, Hon. Wm. E. Dodge, Hon. Seth Low, Dr. Judson Smith, of the American Board; Dr. S. L. Baldwin, of the Methodist Episcopal Board, and Mr. W. Henry Grant, of the Presbyterian Board.

AN OLD PALACE IN DANGER

LOVERS of art and antiquity the world over, will grieve to learn that the famous old palace of the Doges at Venice is in danger of collapse. There are few buildings in all Europe so familiar to the traveler as this beautiful edifice with the adjacent Bridge of Sighs. Parts of this palace were built in the middle of the fourteenth century, and are thus over five hundred years old. The bridge dates from the sixteenth century. The passage of time and the action of the water in the canals, which form the streets of that wonderful city, have, it is reported, undermined the foundations of the palace. The alarm was first given by the fall of parts of the ceilings of the grand halls. The Italian government has directed an examination to be made, and eminent architects are now trying to find out how far the mischief extends and what measures should be taken to prevent a collapse. One suggestion has already been made. It is the removal of the books from the library of the palace. There are, it is said, half a million of these books in the library, weighing in the aggregate five hundred tons. They will be immediately removed, not only to insure their safety, but to relieve the old building of their weight. Afterwards, the walls and the foundations will be examined and plans for the strengthening of the historic building will be discussed. It may be hoped that it will not be necessary to tear down any portion of the edifice, for it is one of the treasures of Italy venerated alike for its beauty and its historic associations. If, however, as the cable report intimates, the foundations have shifted, it will be exceedingly difficult to save the building. They probably rest on piles, driven into the bed of clay which runs through all the islands on which the city of Venice is built. Doubtless when the foundations were laid, they seemed to the builders substantial enough to last for all time, and the fact that they have remained firm for five centuries, shows how strong they were. It is well for the Christian that the dwelling place to which he is heir can never collapse. It will continue throughout eternity, and he is wise who seeks that habitation. It may be said of him as of the patriarch:

He looked for a city which hath foundations whose builder and maker is God (Heb. 11: 10).

The Highest Clock in the World

The largest clock in America and the highest in the world, began its work of measuring time in the great tower of the Philadelphia city hall on New Year's day. There are two larger clocks in existence, one in the tower of the cathedral at Mechlin, Belgium, and the other in the tower of the Houses of Parliament, London, but neither of them is so high by seventy feet as the Philadelphia timepiece. It is 370 feet above the pavement. The diameter of its dials is twenty-two feet. Each hour hand is nine feet long and weighs 175 pounds. The minute hands are sixteen feet long and weigh 225 pounds each. The most astonishing peculiarity of the clock is that it has no weights or pendulum, or any of the works ordinarily used in a clock. Two hundred feet below its dials, under a glass case, there is a master clock which is operated by telegraph from Washington Observatory. The current moves the hands every half-minute, and, as they move, they release a force of compressed air having a pressure of 700 pounds. This is conveyed by fine tubes to a ratchet wheel at the back of the hands on the great dials above. Every half-minute the tip of the ponderous minute hand jumps six and a half inches. Two electric motors operate the pumps which supply the compressed air. So perfect is the system, that it is claimed there can never be a variation even of ten seconds in a week. Thus much science and skill can do to keep us informed of the passage of time. There, their power ends. For the infinitely more important lesson of how to put it to the best use we have to look to a higher Power.

So teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom (Ps. 90: 12).

Tidal Engineering

A report issued by the Harbor and Land Commissioners, describes an extraordinary result of the recent great storm on the Massachusetts coast. Near the town of Marshfield, there used to be a neck of land at the mouth of the river.

DOGES' PALACE AND BRIDGE OF SIGHS IN VENICE, NOW IN DANGER OF COLLAPSE

At intervals for many years back, the project was discussed of cutting a channel through the neck. The recent storm, however, has done it effectually. The gigantic waves made a channel 250 feet wide and fourteen feet deep at low water. This immense work, which would have involved years of costly labor, was performed by the tide in a few hours. People talk in our day of human achievements as if there were nothing greater in the universe, but in the face of such a work as this, we may well pause and remember the power that is wielded by the Most High:

Who can stand before his indignation? Who can abide in the fierceness of his anger? His fury is poured out like fire and the rocks are thrown down by him (Nahum 1: 6).

Bought Herself

A quaint auction sale was held recently at Lackawaxen, Pa. An aged woman, feeble and friendless, was unable to support herself and must be provided for out of the public funds. The custom in that locality is not for the overseers of the poor to take charge of such persons, but to pay some one to do so. In order to learn who is willing to accept the smallest compensation for performing the duty, an auction sale is held, at which the person to be provided for, is knocked down to the lowest bidder. In this instance, the first bidder undertook to supply the woman with board, clothing, medical attendance etc., for four dollars a week. Other bids were made for the old woman, who listened in silence to the humiliating negotiation. The auctioneer seemed about to accept a woodsman's offer of a dollar and a half a week, when he received a bid from the woman herself. She offered to take charge of herself for five dollars a month, and, there being no lower offer, she was knocked down to herself. So far as the public is concerned, she will now belong to herself, but if, as one may hope of a person whose lot is so dreary, she has the joy of knowing that Christ has redeemed her, she will acknowledge his claims on her:

Ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God in your body and in your spirit which are God's (I. Cor. 6: 20).

Canada's Postal Boons

With the new year our neighbors across the border have come into possession of two postal advantages. The rate for domestic letters, which applies also to letters to the United States, is reduced from three to two cents, and the rate for letters to Great Britain and the majority of the British colonies is reduced from five to two cents. The latter concession, is mainly due to the persistence with which the battle for ocean penny postage has been fought in the British Parliament by Mr. Henniker Heaton. Mr. Heaton was elected to Parliament by the borough of Canterbury. He had previously spent several years in Australia, where he acquired large property in land. On entering Parliament, he devoted all his energies to securing a liberal reduction in the rates of ocean postage. A large measure of success has attended his efforts. The mother country and all her chief colonies, one or two in Australia excepted, have now a Postal Union of their own, and a mutual agreement has been secured by which letters will be sent to and from Great Britain and the colonies, and between the colonies and each other, at the uniform rate of two cents. This rate will entail a loss at first on the governments, but it is expected that it will not be a permanent loss. Past experience shows that when the cost of correspondence is reduced, people write more letters, and if it is so in this instance, the loss will grow less from year to year. It is much to be wished that a similar rule applied to human communications with Heaven. They are free, and the blessings they bring are certain, yet many people never pray at all. Like the people of the patriarch's time, they say:

MR. H. HEATON, M. P.

What profit should we have if we pray unto Him? (Job 21: 15).

A Search for a Sister

Advertisements are being published in the daily papers of our large cities by a widow of West New York, N. J., who hopes thereby to find a long-lost sister. The widow has inherited a fortune from her husband, and has carried on his business since his death. She has no children and no near relatives, except her sister. She is anxious to find her to make her heir to her property. It is now several years since she heard from her. When she last wrote she was living in domestic service in Chicago, but letters which have been sent to the address she then gave, have been returned marked, "not found." No one appears to know where she went after leaving that address, and all trace of her is lost. It is safe to conclude that if she knew that her sister was searching for her, and especially if she knew that a fortune was awaiting her, she would gladly make her address known. Anyone who could find her, would win her gratitude by telling her of the search and the wealth she might have. It is such a message, but of infinitely greater moment, that ministers and Christian workers carry to lost sinners. They can tell them of a loving Father, who is waiting to receive them and give them eternal riches:

If children then heirs; heirs of God and joint heirs with Christ (Rom. 8: 17).

A Penalty of Dishonesty

Among the prisoners brought up at Centre Street Police Court, New York, a few days ago, was a man charged with being on a street-car. The magistrate inquired if that was his only offence, as he knew of no statute to prevent the public using the cars. The detective who had arrested him explained that the man was an habitual criminal and had already served a term in the penitentiary. Seeing him on the car, and believing that he was there for an unlawful purpose, he arrested him. The prisoner said he lived a long way up town, and he was on his way home. It was too far to walk, and he wanted to know how he could get home if he must not use a street-car. The magistrate replied that it was no part of his duty to suggest a mode of travel. He said: "You have no right to use a public conveyance. The law forbids men who have been convicted of theft to enter the street-cars. That is one of the penalties you have to pay for not being an honest man." It is no wonder that the man thought he was being hardly dealt with. When a man commits a crime he cannot foresee how far-reaching the penalty will be and how remorselessly it will pursue him through life.

The way of the trangressor is hard (Prov. 13: 15).

"A BEAUTIFUL POSSIBILITY"

A New and Charming Serial Story, Written Exclusively for "The Christian Herald"

CHAPTER XIII

Under the Master's Eye

YOU are not to suppose that because Louis Hildreth occasionally uttered sentiments which shocked the aristocratic ears of his mother and sisters, that he was indifferent to social differences. It was his delight to show them, with cynical unfeeling, how different their conduct was from their creed. It did not disturb him at all, when they convicted him of inconsistency. He made no profession of religion, and so felt himself free to follow his own inclinations, but he could not resist a jibe at their inconsistency. He was in this mood when he reminded his sisters of the different ways they had of treating their poor and rich acquaintances.

"I don't know anyone who likes to choose his company better than you!" observed Isabelle sarcastically.

"Certainly, I do; similarity of environment presupposes similarity of tastes. Probably my idea of enjoyment would not accord with the chimney-sweep's, but at the same time I don't look down on the poor beggar because he hasn't been as fortunate as I in getting his bread well buttered. There is a law of cultivation for humanity as well as plants. Surround a succession of generations with all the advantages of wealth, education and travel, and you produce the aristocrat, just as you get the delicate Solanum Wendlandi from the humble potatoe blossom. Set your aristocrat in the wilderness to earn his living by the sweat of his brow, let the rain and wind of heaven beat upon his delicate skin, shut him away from all the elevating influence to which he has been accustomed and in course of time what have you? His descendants have retrograded. The Solanum has become a potatoe again."

"That's all very well," said Isabelle, "but I believe the instinct of culture will be dormant somewhere."

"Then why do you not recognize it in your chimney-sweep? For all you know he may be a descendant of some impecunious scion of a lordly sire. Probably plenty of them are." Louis rose, and tossed the paper carelessly over to his mother, who had been an amused listener to the discussion. It never occurred to him to do so before. What did women want to know about politics?

"Jesus Christ never seemed to care about externals," said Evadne, softly. "He chose his friends among the common people."

"For pity's sake Evadne!" cried Isabelle, "when will you learn that the Bible is not to be taken literally?"

"Not to be taken literally!" echoed Evadne in wonderment. "How is it to be taken, then?"

"Isabelle means that we have got to make allowances," said her aunt. "Christ could do a great many things that you cannot."

Evadne was silent, while the words of Jesus kept ringing in her ears. "As I have done, so do ye also." If only she could understand!

"By the way, Evadne," said Mrs. Hildreth, "I beg you will not repeat your mistake of yesterday."

"What do you mean, Aunt Kate?"

"Bringing such a disreputable creature into the house! When I came in and found her sitting in the hall and you talking to her, I was perfectly paralyzed. Horrible! Why her rags were abominable, and her feet were bare!"

"But she had no shoes, Aunt Kate, and she was just my height. I was so glad that my clothes would fit her."

"A pretty thing to have your clothes paraded through the streets by such a creature! Most likely she would pawn them for gin. I am sure she must be an improper character."

"But Aunt Kate," pleaded Evadne, "Jesus Christ says we must clothe the naked and feed the hungry if we would be his followers. I must do as he tells me, for I am going to follow him."

"Your uncle does enough of that for the family," said her aunt coldly. "I do not wish you to try any such experiments again."

Puzzled and chilled, Evadne left the room. Was obeying the commands of Christ only an experiment after all?

She crept up to her favorite retreat and threw herself on her gayly-covered couch.

"Oh Jesus Christ!" she cried passionately. "I am glad I did not live in Galilee when You were there! Aunt Kate and Isabelle would have thought it bad form for me to follow You in the crowd where the sinners were. But they can't keep me from doing so now!

"Oh I wish I were dead! No one would care—yes, Pompey would be sorry. Louis would call it a sable attachment, but Pompey loved my father. Oh dearest, dearest father!"

She buried her head in her hands, while wave after wave of desolation broke over the lonely soul.

"A beautiful possibility," her knight of the gate had said. Could life become that to her?

Downstairs, Pompey began to sing:

Shall we meet beyond the river,
Where the surges cease to roll;
Where in all the bright forever
Sorrow ne'er shall press the soul.

The rich vibrations rolled up and trembled about her. She held out her arms, and her voice broke in a cry of triumphant faith,

"Yes, we shall meet, Lord Jesus, face to face, You and I!"

"Pompey," cried Evadne, as the singing ceased, and the hissing, with which Pompey accompanied his stable operations began, "I am going to see your wife."

The black face beamed with satisfaction.

"Dyce'll be mighty uplifted, Miss Vadny. She thought a powerful sight of Mass Lennux."

Evadne stood watching him, as he gave finishing touches to the silver mountings of the handsome harness.

"I don't believe there is another harness in Marlborough that shines like yours, Pompey," she said with a laugh. "You are as particular about it as though every day was a special occasion."

"So 'tis, Miss Vadny," said Pompey simply, "can't slight nuthin' when de Lord's lookin' on. Whoa! Brutis. Dere's goin' ter be holiness to de Lord written on de bells of de horses bimeby, Missy. I'se got it writ dere now."

"I believe you have, Pompey," said Evadne soberly, "for you do your work just as perfectly whether Uncle Lawrence is going to see it or not. You work as if you were trying to please someone out of sight."

Pompey drew himself up to his full height.

"I'se a frien' of de Lord Jesus, Miss Vadny. I's got to do everything perfect 'cause of dat—couldn't bring no disgrace on my Lord."

"But would that disgrace him?" asked Evadne in wonderment.

"Why yes, Missy. If I wuz a poor, shiftless crittur, only workin' for de praise of men, folks would say, 'He's no different from de rest; you've got to keep your eye on him if you want things done properly. De King's chillen ain't no better dan de worl's chillen be.' De Lord Jesus, he say to me, 'Pompey, you must be faithful in the little things as well as in de big. I never slurred nuthin', when I was a walkin' up and down through Canaan. I sees you, Pompey; don't make no difference whether the earthly master does or not.' So I does all de little things to de Lord. Miss Vadny, an' de Jedge knows he can depend on Pompey. Whenever he wants me, I'se here."

"That is lovely!" said Evadne softly, "but don't you get dreadfully tired doing the same work over and over? Every day you have to do exactly the same things. It's as bad as a tread-mill. You just keep on going round and round."

Pompey gave one of his low chuckles.

"Specs dat's de way in dis world, Miss Vadny. We'se got to keep on eatin, an we can't sleep enuff in one night to last for a week, but I 'low its jest one of de beautiful laws of de Lord—de sun, an' de moon, an' de stars keep agoin' over de same groun' most continuous—so long as we'se doin' his will, Missy, it don't matter much whether we'se goin' roun' an' roun' or straight ahead. Stan' over Ceesah!" and Pompey gave a final polish to the horse's already immaculate legs.

"Why don't you blacken their hoofs, Pompey? They used to do it in Barbadoes."

Pompey's eyes twinkled.

"Dat's a no count livery notion, Miss Vadny—a coverin' up de cracks an' makin' de horse's hufs look better dan dey is. De King's chillen can't stoop to any such decepshuns. De Lord Jesus says, 'Pompey, I is de truff. You's got to speak de truff an' live de truff ef you belongs to me.' We ain't got no call to cover up anything, Miss Vadny, ef we'se livin' as de Lord wants us to. 'Sides, dere aint no 'cashun for it—ef we keeps de stable clean, an' de food good, an' gives de horse de right kind of exercise an' plenty of attention, de hufs will take care of demselves," and he held Caesar's foot up for her inspection.

"Hulloa, Evadne, are you taking lessons in farriery? What's the matter, Pompey? Has Caesar got a sand crack?" and Louis sauntered up, the inevitable cigar between his lips.

"I don't 'low my horses ever hez sech things, Mass Louis," said Pompey gravely.

"Ha, ha! what a conceited old beggar you are. But I'll give you your due, and acknowledge the horses are a credit to you." He held a dollar toward him balanced on his forefinger. "Here, take this and fill your pipe with it."

"Don't want no pay for doin' my duty, Mass Louis."

"Pshaw, man! Take a tip, can't you?" Pompey shook his head.

"I don't smoke, Mass Louis."

"Don't smoke!" ejaculated Louis. "You don't here, I know, because the Judge is afraid of fire, but you'll never make me believe that you don't spend your evenings over the fire with your pipe. You darkies are as fond of one as the other."

"You's mistaken, Mass Louis," said Pompey quietly.

"Pon my word! And why don't you smoke, Pomp? You don't know what you're missing. It is the greatest comfort on earth."

"Specs I don't need such poor comfort, Mass Louis. I takes my comfort wid de Lord." Pompey's voice was low and sweet. Evadne felt her heart glow.

"But come now, Pomp," persisted, Louis, "that's all nonsense. You must have some reason for not smoking. Everybody does. Come, I insist on your telling me."

Pompey was silent for a moment. "The pure in heart shall see God," he said slowly. "I 'low, Mass Louis, the King's chillen's got to be pure in body, too."

"You insolent fellow! How dare you?" and Louis dashed the glowing end of his cigar full in the negro's face.

For a moment Pompey stood absolutely still—the cigar, which had left its mark upon his cheek, lying smouldering at his feet—then he turned quietly and walked away.

Louis strode out of the coach house. Evadne followed him, her eyes blazing.

"You are a coward!" she cried, passionately. "You would not have dared to do that to a man who could hit you back. You forced him to tell you and then struck him for doing it! If this is your culture and refinement, I despise it! I am going to be a Christian like Pompey. That is grand!"

"Well done, coz!" and Louis affected a laugh. "There's not much of the 'meek and lowly' in evidence just now at any rate."

He looked after her as she walked away, while her quivering, indignant tones still lingered in his ears.

"By Jove! There's something to her, though she is so quiet! I must cultivate the child."

Seen through Evadne's clear eyes, his action looked despicable and his better nature suggested an apology, but he swept the suggestion aside with a muttered "Pshaw! he's only a nigger," and turned carelessly on his heel.

"You are Dyce," cried Evadne, impulsively, when she reached the cottage, in whose open doorway a pleasant-faced colored woman was standing. "Pompey has told me about you. I think your husband is one of the grandest men I know."

"Thank you Missy. Walk right in. I'm proper glad to see Mass Lennux's chile."

"Why, how did you know me?" asked Evadne, wonderingly

The woman laughed softly.

"Laws, honey, you's de livin' image of your pa."

She excused herself after a few moments, and Evadne laid her head against the cushions of a comfortable old rocking chair and rested. She wondered sometimes where her old strength had gone. She had never felt tired in Barbadoes. The tiny room was full of a homely comfort which did her heart good. There were books lying on the table and flowers in the window; a handsome cat purred lazily in front of the fire-place, and on a bracket in one corner an asthmatic clock ticked off the hours with wheezy vigor. In an adjoining room Evadne could see a bed with its gay patchwork quilt of Dyce's making, and in the little kitchen beyond she heard her singing, as she trod lightly to and fro. A couple of dainty muslin dresses, with soft trimmings of lace, were draped over chairs, for Dyce was the finest clear starcher in Marlborough, and her little kitchen was all too small to hold the products of her skill. She entered the room again, bearing a tray covered with a snowy napkin, on which were quaint blue plates of delicious bread and butter, pumpkin pie, golden browned as only Dyce could bake it, and a glass of fragrant ginger beer, and on this simple fare Evadne feasted royally.

"I did not know anything could taste quite so good," she said, when she had finished. "You must be a wonderful cook."

Dyce laughed, well pleased.

"When de good Lord gives us everything in perfecshun, specs it would be terrible shiftless of me to spoil it in the cooking, Miss Vadny."

"The good Lord," repeated Evadne, slowly. "You know him too, then? You must, if you live with Pompey."

Dyce's face grew luminous.

"He is my joy," she said softly.

"And does he make you happy all the time?" asked the girl, wistfully. "You seem to have to work as hard as Pompey. What is it makes you glad?"

"Laws, honey, how kin I help bein' glad? De chile of de King, on de way to my Father's palace. Aint that enuff occashun to keep a poor colored woman rejoicin' all de day long? I'se so happy I'se a singin' all de time, over my work and in de street—it don't matter where I be."

"But you can't sing in the streets, Dyce."

"Laws, chile, don't you know de heart kin sing when de lips is silent? Its de heart songs that de Lord thinks de most of, but when de heart gits too full, den de lips hez to do their share."

"But suppose you were to lose your eyesight, or Pompey got sick, or——"

Dyce gave one of her soft laughs.

"Laws honey, I never supposes! De Lord's got no use for a lot of supposin' chillen who's alwers frettin' themselves sick for fear Satan'll git de upper hand. De Lord's reignin'—dat's enuff fer me. I 'low he'll take care of me in de best way."

Evadne looked again at the exquisitely laundered dresses.

"Why do you work so hard?" she asked. "Doesn't Pompey get enough by his work to live on?"

"Oh yes, honey, de Jedge gives good wages, but you see we wants to do so much fer Jesus dat de wages don't hold out."

"So much for Jesus!" echoed Evadne.

"Why yes, Missy! He says ef we loves him, we'll do what he tells us, an he's told us to feed the hungry, an clothe the naked, an go preach de Gospel—so, when we cum to talk it over, it seemed dreffful shiftless in me to be doin' nothin', when de Lord worked night and day; so I begun to take in laundry work, an now we have more money ter spen on de Lord. But we never hez enuff. De worl's so full of perishin' souls an starvin' bodies. I tells Pompey I never wanted to be rich till I began ter do de King's bizness. Its dreffful comfortin' work, Miss Vadny."

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE

NEAPOLITAN HOUSEKEEPING

Marketing in the Old World Cities—How the Poor and the Common People Fare

EVERYBODY who goes to Italy talks or writes about the architecture of its ancient churches, its palaces, bridges and canals; others give us a glimpse of its every-day life, its housekeeping, its marketing, the life that "centers around the hearthstone," so to speak. As a matter of dry fact—and in winter a most uncomfortable fact—Italy can hardly be said to have any hearthstones. In a Venetian Art Gallery, in a set of pictures representing the four seasons, winter is symbolized by an elegantly clad dame, holding in her lap the typical Venetian "fireside," a scaldino (brazier). The peasant woman's scaldino has a bale, and she carries it, hanging on her arm, around the house with her, from room to room. You will sometimes find her kneeling on the stone floors of a church, saying her prayers, with the scaldino near by.

The comfort-loving Germans introduced stoves into Venice years ago, but the Venetians, as a mass, know not what to do with them; they cling to their scaldinos. Wood, the only fuel, is very costly. A handful of coals over which to make coffee or soup is the Italian peasant's idea of a fire. This is often beyond his purse, and so, during the winter, the masses eat, for the most part, at public kitchens. Cook-shops of various degrees are open at every turn; peculiar broth from simmering pots is ladled out; the smell of onions and garlic pervades the atmosphere; sellers of roasted pumpkins, pears and chestnuts do a thriving business.

The wood-market is a double row of boats in the Giudecca Canal, loaded with sticks of wood cut about the size of a broom-handle. Peddlers, buying from one to a hundred, come and go all day long. The prosperous housekeeper who can afford to have her own kitchen, has her woodman, who calls on her daily. One of her earliest visitors is the water-carrier, who brings water for cooking and drinking from the public cisterns. The bigolanti (water-carriers) are usually stout, rosy-cheeked girls from the mountains of Fruoli. Water is brought in brazen buckets, one hanging from either end of a bow resting on the carrier's shoulders, and is emptied into huge earthen-ware jars in the kitchen. From the great market at the Rialto, fruits and vegetables are distributed among the numerous grocer's shops and stalls throughout the city; and from the one nearest her our housewife will buy her provisions for the day, if she be too far removed from the Rialto to purchase there and save the middleman's commission. Perhaps without donning street costume, or putting on her hat, she walks down from her apartments in some old palace to a shop below, the baby toddling at her heels and ready to help carry up the parcels. These parcels will be quite small—the people do not purchase food in such quantities as Americans. You can buy a half cent's worth of beef. Fruits and vegetables are abundant and cheap, but meat (except sea food), is not, and the poorer classes eat little of the latter. The middle class peasant's breakfast and supper is bread and coffee; his midday meal, a soup, a vegetable, a bit of meat. "Come, eat four grains of rice with me," is a popular form of asking a friend to dinner, so very lightly does the good-hearted peasant rate his own modest hospitality.

A YOUNG NEAPOLITAN HOUSEWIFE'S MARKETING

Curious Bridal Customs

In Sweden, wedding festivities last several days, and the planting of a fir tree is one of the ceremonies. For "good luck," the bride wears a silver ring in her shoe, and is lavishly adorned with her friends' trinkets. The bridal veil in Norway gives way to a towering head dress. In Bulgaria, a bride is expected to remain dumb for a month, except when addressed by her husband. The removal of this restriction is marked by his ceremonious presentation of a gift. In Lithuania, there is a custom that the bride's ears be boxed by her mother just before the ceremony—an attention which is not intended unkindly. Among Hungarian peasants, in certain districts, a dowerless bride washes the faces and hands of the guests, who in return toss coins into the basin. Among the sponge fisher-folk of Himla, a girl cannot marry until she has brought up a certain number of sponges. In other Greek islands, the men must dive for sponges, and the maiden's father bestows her hand on the suitor who brings up the largest number.

Women and Wage-Earning

The action of a railway company in deciding that from Jan. 1, 1899, it would dispense with all female labor, thus striking from its list at once about 200 women clerks and stenographers, is attracting liberal attention from newspapers, magazines, and women's clubs the country over. Mrs. Lowe, President of the General Federation of Women's Clubs received notice that the women of Colorado proposed to initiate a movement protesting against what is felt to be unjust discrimination against the wage-earning woman. Mrs. Lowe replied: "I heartily endorse the action of the women of Colorado." It is generally held that women of means should not by seeking salaried posts thrust from the field needy brothers and sisters. As for the fear that wage earning will become so attractive that home-making will suffer because of it, Emel Jay, a prominent Southern writer expresses the consensus of opinion thus:

Many women are obliged to work or starve. Many are old maids without masculine supporters. Many must work to support their families and to keep them homes. There need be no fear that love, marriage, and motherhood will cease. These are sweet and holy things to every true woman. Nor need it be feared that women will go out to work unless pushed by necessity.

"Annie's Town"

Near Atlanta, Ga., there is a little town, named as above, and owned in fee simple by the lady whose Christian name it bears. Mary Lamar Jackson thus describes it in an Atlanta paper:

It consists really of a factory, a tiny church and the houses where the factory people live. The factory, houses and church were built by an Atlanta man who owned the property, and who made the experiment of building and naming a town in honor of his sweet young wife. The little town was begun and named just after a desperate illness of the young wife, who is one of the prominent matrons of this city. Thanksgiving, Christmas and New Years' are always delightful times for the inhabitants of Annie's Town; all sorts of nice things are done to make them happy.

Another town in the United States is owned in fee simple by a woman. It is Glen Eyre, Pike Co., Pa., and its possessor is Mrs. Mary T. Carpenter.

The haughty eye shall seek in vain
What innocence beholds;
No cunning finds the key of heaven,
No strength its gate unfolds.

Alone to guilelessness and love
That gate shall open fall;
The mind of pride is nothingness,
The child-like heart is all.

THE SPARROW'S TEXT

A SPARROW lighted, chirping, on a spray
Close to my window, as I knelt in prayer,
Bowed by a heavy load of anxious care.
The morn was bitter, but the bird was gay,
And seemed by cheery look and chirp to say,
"What though the snow conceals my wonted fare,
Nor have I barn or storehouse anywhere,
Yet I trust heaven, even on a winter's day!"

That little bird came like a winged text,
Flutt'ring from out God's Word to sooth my breast:
What though my life with wintry cares be vexed,
On a kind Father's watchful love I rest.
He meets this moment's need; I leave the next,
And, always trusting, shall be always blest.

A Sunshiny Old Age

NOTHING is more beautiful or inspiring than loving, cheerful, sunshiny old folks about the house. "I am useless," "I am helpless," "I am a burden," "I have outgrown my usefulness," say many white-haired ones whose hands are seamed with toil, rendered in willing service when they were able to serve. This idea of being useless and burdensome on the part of the aged is all wrong. Aside from their claim to care and attention, by reason of past services, they have a claim like that of infancy. Who thinks of a baby as burdensome? Don't everybody in the house vie with everybody else for the honor of serving baby? And is not baby, who can do absolutely nothing for himself, the joy of the home? All he can give in return is his royal favor—and he is not always generous of that to devoted slaves, for baby makes no secret of likes and dislikes until with years comes the sad secret that he can sometimes win by diplomacy what is not his by right, or that he must win and hold by diplomacy what should be his by right.

Of course, it is true, baby exercises that attraction which dimples, "palms like curled rose leaves," and flower-like eyes have for us. But if baby is a hope and a promise, age should be faith and benediction. Where baby is coy of his favors, age, knowing that love is divine, conscientiously bestows this most precious of all gifts, as the Father sends sunshine and rain upon just and unjust. Never think, aged ones, because you can not serve, or can not give money, that you are powerless to help and to bless. Everybody wants kind words, everybody wants words of encouragement; everybody—everybody wants love. Perhaps appreciation of love given may not be always ready. Never mind. Be patient. Presently folks will begin to turn to you as flowers to the sun. When children and grandchildren want someone to rejoice and be glad with them, they will come to grandpa and grandma; when they have a sorrow to which no one else has time to list or sympathy to lend, they will come; when grievous errors have been committed for which others have only condemnation, the sensitive penitent will seek the counselor who is patient, loving and merciful. Sometimes—not always—advice will be taken that will save many much trouble. The point is, that the aged ones, who feel themselves a care, become the moral and spiritual burden-bearers of the family, and are members who are by no means easily spared.

Pasadena's Flower Festival

The old year in Pasadena, Calif., was literally "buried in flowers," and the new year welcomed with blossoms. The annual "Tournament of Roses," Pasadena's way of celebrating New Year, occurred on Jan. 2, as the month came in on Sunday. There were innumerable carriages and coaches, and many diminutive donkey-carts driven by children; all were garlanded with flowers; everybody was pelted with blossoms; the air was full of fragrance, and everybody seemed happy.

THE YOUNG MAN IN THE BACK SEAT,

or, The Things that Hinder

"WHY ARE YOU NOT UP THERE AT THE FRONT?"

IN the course of meetings for young men in college, or Young Men's Christian Association, or a church, there are often seen young men who prefer to occupy the back seat. Why do they not go to the front as they would at any other kind of meeting? This pastor has had the curiosity to inquire from the young men themselves. The answers have varied considerably, indicating that there are many motives that may weigh with a young man in taking a back seat. From my note book I select a few of the answers given to an invitation to go forward. I set them down here and in a succeeding article, with the arguments I have used against staying in the back seat. I do so in the hope that young men will consider them and also that Christian workers at such meetings may get some little help in dealing with the young man in the back seat. One excuse often given by these young men in answer to an invitation to go forward is:

1. "The fellows I go with."

Here, at the back of the room, are a lot of bright-faced, cheery-voiced men. One's heart is drawn out toward them, and the look in their eyes is not unfriendly. "Why are you not up there at the front with the rest of the men?" you ask. And one answers fairly and frankly: "Well, you see, there are a lot of fellows I go with"—and then he stops, with a glance over his shoulder.

Yes, we understand, but, friend, are you going to let that set of men you go with control your action and rule your life? What you need is a straight-out declaration of independence. It will help your self-respect, it will give you the respect of others.

"When I first came to the city," says our Daniel Christian, "I determined that I would keep on good terms with the boys. So when they asked me to have a game of cards, or to go to some place of questionable resort, I would say, 'Not this time,' or, 'I'm busy now,' or some evasion of that sort. At last it came to me, this isn't right! The next time they approached me I said, 'Boys, I'm a Christian.' That settled it, and I've had a better time ever since. Try it."

2. "Don't care to set myself up."

I well recall when I first ran across this young man. I have met him several times since,—so have you. Quoth he, an honest, ingenuous look on his face: "The folks at home don't sympathize with this sort of thing, and I don't care to set myself up as better than they are."

Indifferent father or mother; careless brother or sister: do you realize how your low-level religion, a sheer irreligion is quenching every higher impulse that comes to that generous-hearted boy you dote on so much. What if your thoughtlessness, your heedlessness of the things imminent and eternal should cost him his soul. Think of it.

Out on the lake there a ship tossed, vexed by the rising waves. The life-saving service leveled their glasses, looking for a signal, but none came. The night fell and with it a storm. In the morning wreckage strewed the shore, the ship was gone. Two or three survivors were picked up from the floating masts and spars. "Why didn't you signal if you wanted help?" "O!" said one, "the mate was drunk and had locked up the rockets." Alas! for the worldly, drunken spirit of this world that silences the instinctive cries of the heart.

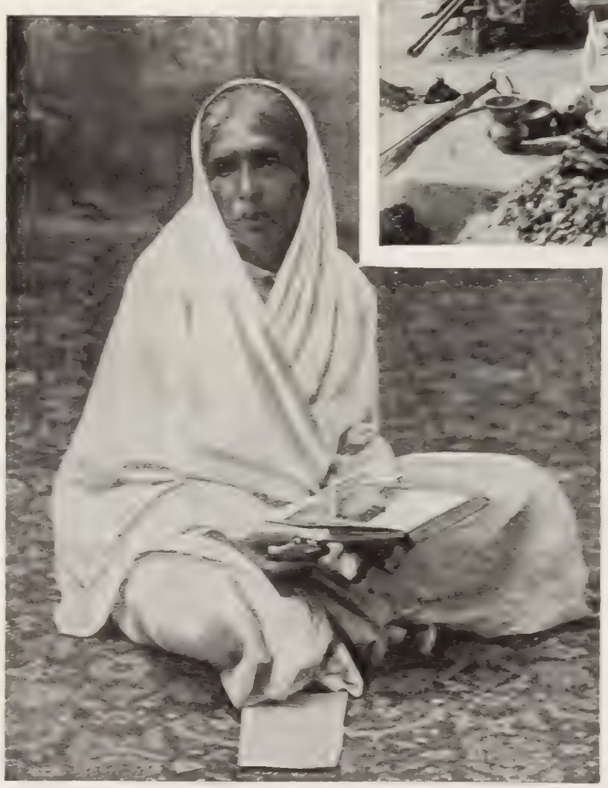
That is what he said last night, and the evening before. He says it again, now. Does this young man know it? —[illegible] in the fateful, whirlpool of [illegible] smitten with the bad winds of procrastination. Once under the spell of these, you are gone. But, come now, cut loose. You say you intend to take a stand sometime. Do it now. That little word foils Satan. Have you thought of it, the only place we touch eternity is in the little impinging point of time, now. Carpe diem—seize the day, the hour, the moment. Smash Satan's hour-glass. "Now is the accepted time." Be out at once for God.

Undoubtedly the happiest and best way is to enter new surroundings with your banners afloat for the right. Take a stand right at the beginning. The writer will not soon forget that young man met accidentally at the college doors. In waiting upon the authorities he strayed, by a happy chance, or rather Providence, into the room where young men interested in their soul's salvation, were seeking advice. He heard the word of truth, he seized the opportunity. He began his student life an outspoken Christian. "I never did a better thing" he tells me now.

It is the past that is troubling this young man, as it was the future that misled the one just spoken of. You can see he is anxious, and deeply so. But a heavy burden loads him down. "Something took place back there," he says, and because of that bad item of record behind him he feels debarred from taking a right position to-day. He is being ridden to death by his past—slave to the things that have been.

Here is needed another declaration of independence. Be master of yourself and your action in the present. Leave the past where God in his grace puts it—under the blood. Take what he gives you now and forget the things behind.

There in Col. Clark's Mission, at Chicago, I heard it, and shall not let it slip. "My life has not been what it ought to be; but why call it up. Who am I to be always remembering what God has forgotten and put forever behind his back?" Never mind yesterday. "To-day, if you will hear his voice." "There's something back." Yes, but there is something above—grace abounding.



CHUNDRA LELA AFTER HER CONVERSION

CHUNDRA LELA

Mrs. Ada Lee's Story of the Converted Brahmin Lady Who Had Been a Fakir

AMONG the missionaries in India to whom the orphan fund of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD is being sent is Mrs. Ada Lee of Calcutta. She has one hundred and ten girls, besides twenty boys, in her home, who are being trained for Christ. Mrs. Lee is a native of West Virginia. She first went to India by the recommendation of Bishop Thoburn, under the auspices of the Union Missionary Society, in 1876. She speedily acquired the language, and labored successfully with the Bengalee women of Calcutta. There she married Rev. David H. Lee, a missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church, who went out under Bishop William Taylor. Mr. Lee and his wife labored together in the Lord's work in Calcutta for two years, when, owing to the failing of Mr. Lee's health, they were obliged to return to their native country. They remained here preaching and speaking of the needs of India for some time, pleading for funds to carry the Gospel into the dark homes which Mrs. Lee had so often visited. One Christian gentleman placed $15,000 in Mrs. Lee's hands, to commence an independent work of the kind she had advocated; other friends contributed until sufficient money was in hand to start with. The two missionaries with their children at once returned to Calcutta, and established the institution which under the name of "The Dennett Training School" is now widely known among the native people of India.

In the course of her work Mrs. Lee is brought into contact with some strange characters. The story of one of them, as she tells it, is full of thrilling interest. Some time ago she welcomed to her home a woman who formerly belonged to the fakirs—that class of ostensibly holy people who are venerated and almost worshiped by the Hindus.

Chundra Lela told Mrs. Lee the history of her life. She was a Brahmin, and the daughter of a wealthy land owner of Nepaul. In accordance with Hindu customs, she was married at the age of seven, but two years afterwards while still in her father's house, news was brought her that her boy husband was dead. What it means to be a child widow in India none can fully know but the [illegible] humiliation and the misery of their lot is so great that many have said it was better for them in the old days, before the English government abolished the practice of burning the widow on her husband's bier. Chundra Lela some years afterwards was called to undergo another bereavement. Her beloved father died, and her lot was then desolate, indeed. She had been taught to read the Hindu sacred books, and from them she learned that the loss of husband and father was a punishment for some sin she had committed. The only way that she knew of to atone for it was to go on pilgrimage. For more than seven years she painfully toiled over the mountains and plains of India, traveling on foot from one shrine of reputed sanctity to another, making offerings, feeing the priests and bathing in the sacred rivers. But she gained no assurance that her sin was forgiven.

CHUNDRA LELA'S SELF TORTURE

Then the idea of self-torture fastened itself on her mind. She joined the fakirs at Ramgunge. Like them, she smeared her body with ashes and painted her face with the red and white marks which make them hideous. Stripping herself almost naked she seated herself on a deerskin rug under the broiling sun and lighted five fires around her. There she vowed that she would sit day and night without moving during the six hot months of the year. During winter she vowed to spend her nights in a pond with the water up to her neck. Day and night her constant prayer was to the gods, that they would accept her suffering as atonement and forgive her. Three years passed away in these tortures and at the end she was as far away from peace as ever.

One day she was at Midnapore, and there for the first time she came in contact with Christianity. A sister of Dr. Phillips, the missionary, saw her and told her the Gospel story. The woman's heart thrilled under it. She bought a Bible and read for herself. She went to Dr. Phillips for teaching, and after a few months, in spite of the entreaties and menaces of her Hindu relatives, she embraced Christianity and was baptized. When she visited Mrs. Lee she had been for several years a messenger of Christ to the women of India. Scarcely a city or a town that she had not visted, going from home to home proclaiming the Gospel that had set her free.

INGERSOLL ARRAIGNED

Extracts from a Lecture Delivered in New York in Reply to the Famous Infidel, Showing the Sophistry of His Arguments

By Samuel Colcord

I AM not here this evening to establish the grounds of the Christian faith; nor am I here to deliver to you a lecture on the evidences of Christianity. The foundations of the Christian religion are so broad and founded so deep in the researches of scholarship that I do not for a moment pretend to the competence to properly discuss them; nor would there be time to give more than a hint of the impregnable position of the Christian religion in the foundations of reason.

But as I am a plain business man, and in that sense at least a man of the world, I address you simply as a layman, claiming no especial authority, no authority in fact but the authority of reason, to which you all appeal, and not attempting even to appeal to the authority of the Bible, though I recognize it.

It was my privilege not long since to listen to the lecture of Colonel Ingersoll on the "Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child," and to that I will give attention.

Ingersoll's Sophistries

I saw the young men in his audience, intelligent, bright, progressive, thinking young men; but ignorant of religion. Before such men he uttered sentiments so beautiful and so beautifully expressed as to captivate the hearts of all his hearers. His beautiful sentiments I fully endorse and you can hear them every Sunday from all the Christian pulpits of this town. But he put them in the wrong relation. The Christian doctrines of love and mercy he made to appear the beautiful and exclusive property of infidelity in contrast with the severe doctrine of divine justice as if it were all of Christian belief!

When I saw the wrong done to the young men, to affect forever their future, not by honest argument, but by the trickery of misrepresentation, in fields so unfamiliar to many of them as to leave them without defence, I resolved to tear away the veil of sophistry and expose the trickery of his method.

I am not here because the religion of Christ needs defense. It needs none. I am here because I believe in fair play for the young man, and therefore I take issue with the lecturer.

In a review of the lecture, there are but three points to the discussion, or three issues: 1. Is infidelity or Christianity the friend of human liberty? 2. On which side is the scholarship? 3. Which is the better exemplar of love and human brotherhood?

These are practical, not metaphysical questions, and if I seem in parts of this address to be not overprofound, let it be remembered that I am angling for fish seldom found in deep water. I desire to meet the colonel on his own ground.

In the lecture, the opening sentence of which was "Liberty is my religion," he so misrepresented the Bible and the Christian religion as to make them appear the enemies of liberty. He presented pictures of persecution to his applauding hearers as the spirit of the Christian church.

What have the mistakes of Christian fanatics of generations ago to do with the living questions of to-day?

The Dark Ages Passed Away

Is infidelity so weak in argument, so sorely pressed for reasons that it is necessary for its great champion, when he would attack the great living organism of Christianity, to ignore all the conditions of the present and go far into the past to find something then called Christian that he may attack?

I know of no Christian persecutions of to-day. I know not where I may find the Christian rack and the thumbscrew.

It is the glory of the Christian religion that the faith of Christ has so elevated the human race that has come under its influence, that the dark age has passed away, and the Christian church stands foremost in the defense of liberty.

Discussing the freedom of woman, I might show how Christianity has elevated womanhood to the dignified position she occupies on the earth to-day; how from a condition worse than slavery it exalted and ennobled her, so that it would seem a strange thing for any woman in our day to take sides with infidelity.

The colonel spoke of the liberty of the child, and that was the most remarkable thing in his lecture. But he had his audience so charmed with the magic of his eloquence that it seemed all right.

His idea of the government of childhood and the home was that you should let the child do as it pleases. Let it get up when it pleases in the morning; let it go to bed when it pleases at night; let it eat when it wants to, what it wants, and as much as it wants; and leave your pocketbook on the table, and say to your child: "There is the pocketbook; help yourself."

That seems very remarkable, but it is what the colonel said.

The Government of Children

It is related that an ardent follower of Colonel Ingersoll did try it once, and he said: "Now, my son, I am going away, and you can do as you please when I am gone. I leave my pocketbook on the table, and you can do as you please." He was gone about a week. He came back at night, and after stumbling over a wagon in the hall, and being bitten by the bulldog, which the boy in the unbiased exercise of his wisdom had bought, and meeting with other uncomfortable experiences, he looked for his pocketbook to pay a pressing bill, but found it empty.

Some time later he was asked what he thought of Colonel Ingersoll's idea of the government of children. "Well," he said, "It is very pleasant to listen to, but the man is a born idiot who will try to follow it the second time."

"Liberty is my religion," said Colonel Ingersoll, and that is the kind of liberty he believes in—to do about as you please. Perhaps a good many men would like to have it that way, but society has thought differently, and has established laws governing the State, and laws governing the home

If you cannot govern your home by that kind of philosophy, how do you expect God to govern a universe by it?

Next there is the freedom of the intellect. But the lecturer describes himself as a passenger on board a ship, not knowing whence he came or whither he is going, but intending to have all the enjoyment he can while on the journey, and be on good terms with the passengers. This is all very good so far as it goes, but it does not go far enough.

There are wise young men in my audience this evening who say they will not believe anything which they cannot understand. They do not understand the circulation of the blood in the human system, nor the marvelous intricacies of the human eye, nor what is the life, nor what is the mind; what determines the processes of thought, nor even the life that is in the smallest blade of grass or the tiniest green leaf of the forest, yet they would understand all the mysteries of God's being and purposes; and if there is one little thing in God's great plan they do not understand, they think the mighty foundations of religion are shaken.

I am reminded of the good old Quaker who heard a man talking somewhat in that way. He said he would not believe anything he had not seen, or that had not been seen by anyone else, so far as he knew. The old Quaker said: "Young man, did thee ever see thy own brains?" "I don't know that I ever did." "Does thee know anyone who ever saw thy brains?" "I really don't know that I do." "Does thee believe thee has any?"

Colonel Ingersoll tells us that the difference between the Christian and the self-styled free-thinker (as if the only free thinking is his way of thinking), is only a question of the size and quality of the brain, at which his hearers applauded, as if that settled it.

If that is it—if it is only a question of brains—I accept the challenge, and we will see whether the preponderance of brains is on the infidel or Christian side.

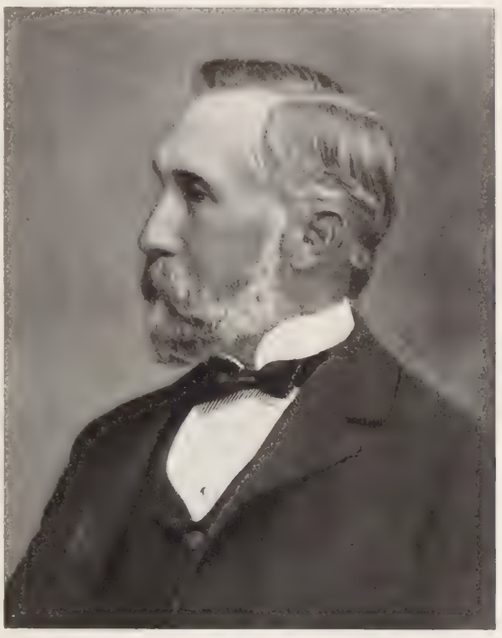
Of infidels, there were the great Voltaire and Hume and Tom Paine, of some generations past. Our own times have produced three eminent scientists, sceptical but not altogether infidel, Chas. Bradlaugh, and one other, Colonel Robert Ingersoll, all the product of Christian homes; three if not four of them the sons of Christian ministers.

If there are other very great infidels in our day (and I wish you to distinctly note that I say that there are), they are so very few you will have to think a little to recall a name. Looking back to other generations, we see here and there one great thinker on the infidel side.

It would take the day and the night to call the great names in the Christian list, not pietists, but thinkers and doers of the most rugged kind. Many of them were profoundly Christian, many others inconsistent and even grossly unchristian in their lives, but all giving intellectual assent to the truths of the religion of Christ. That is exactly the point. Piety, morality, have nothing to do with the question at this point of the discussion. It is a question of intellectual assent only. Does the intellect of the world approve and endorse the Christian religion?

Eminent Christians

On the Christian side, I name the great Sir Isaac Newton, the father of modern philosophy and the inductive system; Locke, Agassiz, Herschel, Hitchcock,



MR. SAMUEL COLCORD

Dawson, Dana; Columbus, possessing a new world in the name of the cross; Cromwell, crushing a despotism and establishing the liberties of Britons for all time, his armies marching to victory while shouting Christian psalms; Wellington, conquering the great Napoleon, and Napoleon, confessing that Christ was the greater Conqueror; our sturdy forefathers landing from the Mayflower in the name of liberty and religion, to found an empire of freedom; Washington, throwing off the yoke of tyranny that a great republic might find birth on this Western hemisphere; John Adams, Patrick Henry, the lover of freedom; nearly all the signers of the Declaration of Independence and framers of the constitution; Franklin, statesman, scientist, philosopher, patriot; Clay, Webster, the immortal Lincoln, Seward, Grant, the modern genius of war; Sherman, Meade, Thomas; the great Lee, the Christian gentleman as well as warrior; Stonewall Jackson, on the eve of battle spending the night behind his tent in prayer; Peabody, the philanthropist; Morse, inventing the electric telegraph; Cyrus Field, surmounting forty years of difficulties to lay the Atlantic cable, until, in the realization of his faith, the hemispheres clasp hands; Garfield, Blaine, Thurman; almost all the great names of American history; Livingstone, the missionary explorer; Stanley, his great successor, beginning his mighty task almost a doubter, returning to declare that the only hope of Africa is the Christian missionary. In literature, Shakespeare (infidels claim him but they cannot maintain the claim), Milton, Scott, Bunyan, Macaulay, Emerson, Carlyle, Lowell, Victor Hugo, Longfellow, Whittier, Tennyson. Among living men, in jurisprudence, nearly all the great jurists of the world; in medicine, the great physicians; in statesmanship, nearly every great name in every civilized nation on the globe; in our own country, the President, the ex-presidents, and every name considered a Presidential possibility; in Germany, living but as yesterday, Bismarck, the Iron Chancellor, profoundly religious; in Great Britain, Salisbury and his ministry; most of the great liberal leaders; and last, not now living, but of our times, and who being dead yet speaketh, the grand old man without a peer on the earth—the great Gladstone; great in theology, great in scholarship, great in patriotism, great in love of freedom and the human race, great in manhood.

Colonel Ingersoll is himself a product of the Christian religion; the son of a Christian minister and of a Christian mother, brought up surrounded by the influences of a Christian home and by the influences of a Christian community.

The liberty which he possesses and abuses he owes to the Christian religion, that has been the mightiest champion for human freedom and progress on the earth for eighteen centuries. The morality that he possesses is something which he inherited from his Christian parents, and that he learned in his Christian home, and which developed under the influences of a Christian community in which he lived, though he opposed its Christian sentiment.

We have now come to the final question: Is Christianity or infidelity the better exemplar of love and human brotherhood?

Infidelity condemns faith and extols works. It laughs at believing, but loudly applauds doing. What has it done? I know not where are its works of righteousness, or where it has builded its monuments of charity, its houses for human refuge.

Christianity has certainly done something to exemplify the great Scriptural doctrine of the universal brotherhood of man and that love which it declares to be the fulfilling of the law.

I entertain a stranger in the city of New York. Introducing him first to the lower part of the city, I show him the humble missions near the wharves. I show him the Newsboys' Lodging House, the Howard Mission, the Home for the Friendless and the Childrens' Aid Society schools.

Fruits of Christianity

He asks: "What noble pile is that?" "That is the Cooper Institute." "And what is the great red building covering a square?" "The Bible House." I point out the many homes for the aged and orphaned and crippled and blind, the great St. Luke's and other hospitals, the eye and ear hospitals, the Prison Mission, the Medical Mission, the Flower Mission, the Fruit Mission, the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and I tell him that there are hundreds more like them in the city, all monuments of Christian benevolence. I show him the new St. Luke's Hospital, the new Columbia University, and the new Cathedral of St. John the Divine, now rearing their colossal heads under the mason's hand. I tell of the Collegiate Reformed Dutch churches, and point out the other great churches as we pass, and tell him that there are more than six hundred of them in the town, and nearly as many more across the river in Brooklyn, or a grand total of 1,154 in Greater New York.

In all this the stranger has been much interested, but silent. But now he says to me: "There is a distinguished citizen of your city, Colonel Robert Ingersoll, an eloquent man, whose wonderful teachings and expressions of love for my kind I have had great pleasure in reading. Will you kindly point out to me the monuments of his philosophy?"

And I reply: "I had not thought of that: but now, coming to think of the monuments of his belief in this town—there are none.

There, ladies and gentlemen, is a demonstration. Disbelief is as old as the Christian religion: it has its great advocates who for hundreds of years have presented its panaceas for human ills as much better than anything Christianity had to offer. It, too, has had its multitudes of followers: it has loudly professed its love for the human race, and that love it has proclaimed as its religion; but there in the city of my home is the demonstration. On the one hand, a demonstration of power and munificence and helpfulness for the race; on the other, a demonstration of impotence, of failure, of utter uselessness. The great Master has prescribed the test, "By their fruits ye shall know them." By that test the Christian religion will stand against the world.

Man must think, says Colonel Ingersoll. Yes, and when he thinks, it occurs to him that when a man of Colonel Ingersoll's masterful powers has been preaching for thirty years to crowding multitudes and yet you cannot find one gambler whom he has led to forsake his nefarious trade, one thief that he has made an honest man, one poor besotted drunkard that he has clothed with reason and the dignity of ennobled manhood, there must be something radically wrong in his philosophy.

Once, standing on the platform of Chickering Hall, in New York, I flung out this challenge to infidelity. Let it bring one poor wreck of humanity rescued, lifted from degradation to noble life by the teachings of all the infidels in New York, and for every one so brought I would produce a hundred men lifted from the lowest depths to honest manhood by the work of a single humble missionary of Christ.

I stood with the list in my hand and invited the newspaper press of the city, there represented by a number of reporters, to investigate the genuineness of the Christian's hundred and infidel's one, if the challenge were accepted.

Infidelity never accepted the challenge. Infidelity prates about humanity, but does nothing for humanity. As a vital and vitalizing force, it is utterly and hopelessly imbecile.

Imagine hanging here a map of the globe. Now mark on the map with blackened brush the nations which are the lowest in intelligence, the most degraded, and in every respect behind the age. Look: they are the nations where Christianity has found the least success in the presentation of its belief.

Now come, artist, and paint the colors of the sunlight on the nations of the earth that are foremost, that are the most advanced in morality, in science, in intelligence and art, in commerce, in freedom, in the prosperity and happiness of the citizen, in everything which goes to the making of a great and noble people. See! you have marked out on the map the nations which are the Christian nations, and the lighter shade is where the nations are the most Christian, where the Bible has freest course and is the most believed.

And that is true every time. There is no exception. I challenge any infidel to show it differently. All over the world the shades are light or dark exactly in proportion to the progress or absence of the Christian religion.

If the agnostic has something for me to believe, and infidelity has something to take the place of the Bible and Christian belief, something better, something more helpful to the human race, let it produce the fruits before I am called upon to renounce that which my own heart and the united testimony of millions of the best of every generation for nineteen centuries tell me is ennobling and blessed in its influence, that which has in every age and in every clime regenerated and exalted and glorified mankind.

Let it bring its sons from far and its daughters from the ends of the earth ennobled and sanctified under its power. Until then I stand by the old faith, which, though old, is not yet obsolete, and has not lost its old-time power to bless the sons of men.

The Gospel in Africa's Mines

A Letter from Johannesburg which Tells of Cheering Missionary Progress

MR. D. W., a subscriber of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has forwarded to us a letter received from his youngest son, a missionary in South Africa. Mr. W. has six sons, four of whom are ministers, while two are deacons—practically a whole family devoted to Gospel work. The letter says:

[illegible]

JOHANNESBURG, Z.A.R., So. Africa, Oct. 19.

Dear Parents:—Your ever-welcome letters have continued to pour in like cold water to the thirsty soul. You will never get too old nor too weak to look up to God in prayer for us, and this we appreciate very much.

Only the other day I was thinking I would give almost anything to be at home some morning, and sit in a corner and you take the Bible and go ahead and have our old-fashioned family worship, such as we were permitted to enjoy all through our lives. Although in childhood these things were thought little of, they were as a hammer upon a rock, and it was this that made an impression and left Gospel grooves and bruised places which were never to be forgotten. Oh, why will parents be so careless as to neglect family prayer! Surely there is nothing formal about God's Word; it ought to come first every morning. I thank you for being so faithful in holding eternal things before us children. These are the sweetest recollections of my childhood.

The Lord is good to us out here, and the work is filled with encouraging and soul-inspiring facts. Almost daily something takes place that shows forth the wonderful workings of God's Spirit upon the hearts of men, even though they be in darkest heathenism. We also find that our work is growing very fast. Some of our boys who were lately snatched from the jaws of heathenism, are now preaching more clearly to others than we ever preached to them, as they know better how to meet the heathen's superstitious ideas, and they can break the spell where we would fail. Some are the most earnest workers we have ever seen. Where we stood alone a few months ago, we now have a band of truly converted men and boys, who are full of something to say about Indaba ka Jesu (Story of Jesus). This is encouraging and we thank God for it. One old rough heathen man exclaimed, after one of our boys had finished a very earnest talk: "Oh, surely the name of Christ moves the world."

Lately I took a trip to Swaziland, some 300 miles away. We visited some kraals, following native foot-paths on the bicycle. Boys and girls at first sight took to their heels, and children ran off crying. In many places we were not met with words of welcome, as recent trouble had only been settled between the Dutch and the natives, and every man had his hands full of spears and knob-sticks, and large shields were carried by many. Nevertheless we had some good kraal meetings. We also visited some mission stations where we had some good meetings and received a hearty welcome.

The other day I was counting up the different tribes that are represented in our school, and I found that there were nine in all.

An Armenian Christmas Gift

In a recent article on the work among the Armenian orphan children at Harpoot, Mr. George P. Knapp gives this touching incident:

I wish I might tell of the simple, yet very enjoyable festivities on the Armenian New Year (January 13th), five days before their Christmas. Mrs. Barnum must be allowed to tell part of the story: "In the morning some of the boys of one Home brought us a tray, on which each boy had put something—a few nuts, 'liblebs' (a kind of roasted pea), or raisins, with a note expressing their appreciation of what is done for them. This is a copy translated by some one in the college:

"Dear Sir and Mistress:—We wish you a happy New Year. We have not any material return to offer for your kindness, but only our affectionate thanks, like a pretty and delicate rose. We are glad that at Christmas we can taste with pleasure some sweetmeats given in behalf of you. Be sure that not only our thanks and prayers will be given to you in heaven [illegible] Heaven. Father, the Lord of recompense will reward you in many ways. We pray God that moral and material success [illegible] children may be visible by the help of the Holy Spirit. Sirs and Mesdames, the effect of your moral and material assistance has been seen on Saturday evening, Dec. 25, when fifteen boys out of forty-five, repenting, confessing, and weeping, resolved to live [illegible] be in fulfilling the command of Jesus Christ, 'Love [illegible]'

"The children asked one day if they might give up one meal that day, eating only bread, so that they might give their food to the poor, and this was done. It was their Christmas offering."

The Gospel in Our New Colonies

As the military settlement of our new colonies in the West Indies and the Philippines progresses, the opportunities for Christian work of a missionary and educational character multiply. One Hope's Enough for Me

ONE hope's enough for me
To light me through the gloam;
The hope to dwell fore'er with thee
In yonder happy home.

One life's enough for me
This side the golden shore;
One life to suffer here with thee,
Then reign forevermore.

One hope's enough for me,
One life for my employ,
One heart such as I find in thee,
One song of endless joy.

Anecdotes by Moody

Illustrations and Incidents in the Life of the World's Greatest Evangelist*

THERE is a story of an old Christian slave in the South whose master was an infidel. One day the master went duck-shooting with his slave, and turning on him suddenly, he said:

"How is it, uncle, that the devil never tempts me, and always worries you? Why should he tempt a Christian more than an infidel?"

Before the slave could find an answer, a flock of ducks came within range and the master fired into them. He then directed the slave to make haste to secure the wounded birds first, and let those that were dead wait till last. When the slave returned to his master he had found his answer:

"You see, massa, I reckon it is this way about the devil. He thinks I'm only a poor, wounded soul that he wants to make sure of first, but you are surely his, and so you can wait."

There was a great deal of theology in the old man's reasoning. When a man is truly born of God, it seems as if every influence of evil is arrayed against him, and unless the work is genuine he will not stand.

Both Afraid

I remember a man in New York who used to come and pray with me. He had his cross. He was afraid to confess Christ. It seemed that down at the bottom of his trunk he had a Bible. He wanted to get it out and read it to a companion with whom he lived, but he was ashamed to do it. For a whole week that was his cross; and after he had carried the burden that long, and after a terrible struggle, he made up his mind. He said: "I will take my Bible out to-night and read it." He took it out, and soon heard the footsteps of his mate coming upstairs.

His first impulse was to put it away again, but then he thought he would not—he would face his companion with it. His mate came in, and seeing him at his Bible, said:

"John, are you interested in these things?"

"Yes," he replied.

"How long has this been, then?"

"Exactly a week," he answered; "for a whole week I have tried to get out my Bible to read to you, but I have never done so till now."

"Well," said his friend, "it is a strange thing. I was converted on the same night, and I, too, was ashamed to take my Bible out."

Only the Sick Ones Would Follow

A friend, who was traveling in the East, heard that there was a shepherd who still kept up the custom of calling his sheep by name. He went to the man and said:

"Let me put on your clothes, and take your crook, and I will call them, and see if they will come to me."

And so he did, and he called one sheep, "Mina, Mina," but the whole flock ran away. Then he said to the shepherd:

"Will none of them follow me when I call them?"

The shepherd replied: "Yes sir, some of them will; the sick sheep will follow anybody."

I'm not going to make the application, I leave that to you.

Don't Trifle with God

I met a man some time ago who told me he had never sinned in his life. He was the first perfect man I had ever met. I thought I would question him, and began to measure him by the law. I asked:

"Do you ever get angry?"

"Well," he said, "sometimes I do; but I have a right to do so. It is righteous indignation."

"Do you swear when you get angry?"

He admitted he did sometimes.

"Then," I asked, "are you ready to meet God?"

"Yes," he replied, "because I never mean anything when I swear."

Suppose I steal a man's watch and he comes after me. "Yes," I say, "I stole your watch and pawned it, but did not mean anything by it. I pawned it and spent the money, but I did not mean anything by it."

You would smile at and deride such a statement.

Ah, friends! You cannot trifle with God in that way.

How to Warm Up the Church

I was once preaching in Scotland, and when I got to the church it was so cold that I could see my breath three feet away. I said to the "beadle," as they call him:

"Aren't you going to have any heat in this building?"

He said they had no stoves or any other provision for heat.

"Well, how do you expect people to get warm?"

"Oh!" he said, "we expect the pulpit to warm us up."

Covering a Sun-Dial

Phillips Brooks told the story of some savages to whom was given a sun-dial. So desirous were they to honor and keep it sacred that they housed it in and built a roof over it.

Is your belief in God so reverent that you put it to one side carefully as being too sacred for daily use? Learn to use it. Let God in on your life. Let your faith inspire you to good works.

A Well-Deserved Rebuff

When I first held meetings in Glasgow, my committee (without my knowledge), sent to a livery establishment that kept a thousand horses, to engage a cab to drive me to my meetings on Sunday. The proprietor was a godly man, and sent me this message:

"Tell Mr. Moody he will do as much good by walking to his meetings as by driving three or four miles through the Fourth Commandment."

PLYMOUTH SEEKING A PASTOR

Rev. N. D. Hillis, of Chicago, Proposed by the Advisory Committee to Succeed Dr. Abbott

PLYMOUTH Church, Brooklyn, once occupied by the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, and recently rendered vacant by the resignation of Rev. Lyman Abbott, will in all likelihood soon have a new occupant. At a recent meeting of the Advisory Committee of the Church, the members were unanimously of the opinion that the Rev. Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis, of Chicago, should be called as pastor. A sub-committee was appointed to confer with Dr. Hillis, who has been invited to lecture and preach in Plymouth Church. It is considered highly probable that the choice of the Advisory Committee will be ratified by the Church, and that Dr. Hillis will receive a formal call to the vacant pulpit.

REV. NEWELL DWIGHT HILLIS

Dr. Hillis is of Puritan ancestry. His father, before moving to Iowa, was deacon in the church of Lyman Beecher, father of Plymouth's famous pastor. Newell was born in Iowa, Sept. 2, 1858. Subsequently his father went to Nebraska, where Newell received a common school education and worked on his father's farm. At the age of seventeen he was drawn into the missionary field, and worked energetically for three years, during 1878-79-80, under the direction of the American Sunday School Union, building up churches and Sunday Schools. He was the general missionary of the Union in Southwestern Nebraska. As the result of his labors in that capacity, many Sunday Schools were founded, and a number of churches have sprung up. Even in those early days, he gave evidence of marked ability as a preacher, and people came from long distances to attend his services. During his summer vacations, he went to Wyoming and did excellent missionary work among the miners.

His first call to the ministry came after he had concluded his theological studies at McCormick Seminary in 1884, and was from the First Presbyterian Church of Peoria, Ill. There he conducted a most successful pastorate and built a large church. His next charge was at Evanston, where another handsome and commodious church edifice had to be built to accommodate the crowds who flocked to hear him. While there he received a call to Chicago to succeed Prof. David Swing. His services are held in Central Music Hall, Chicago, where he attracts even larger congregations than his predecessor. The congregation is very wealthy, and their pastor's salary is a princely one. Central Church holds but one service a week, and its membership is so widely distributed that pastoral work is impracticable.

Dr. Hillis, if chosen, will bring to the duties of the new pastorate a mind well stored with Biblical truth, a heart that beats in sympathy with every effort for the conversion of sinners and the general betterment of the human race, and an intellect probably second to none in the American pulpit at the present time. He is in no sense an evangelical preacher, however, but inclines to the "new theology," as taught by Beecher and Abbott. His sermons, illustrative rather than argumentative, are perfect in form, vigorous yet highly polished in diction, and strongly recall the literary style of the late Bishop Brooks, and show also the influence of writers of the Matthew Arnold school of philosophy. Love, "sweetness and light," runs through every discourse like threads of silver. It is hardly necessary to add that Dr. Hillis is a great admirer of both Beecher and Abbott. His library contains the second largest Beecher collection in the world. As an author of religious works he has already taken a high position, his principal books being, A Man Larger Than Success, The Investment of Influence, How the Inner Light Failed, and Foregleams of Immortality.

Whichever Way the Wind Blows

Mr. Spurgeon went into the country to visit a friend who had built a new barn, and on the barn was a cupola upon which they had put a weather vane with this text upon it: "God is love." Mr. Spurgeon said to the man:

"What do you mean by putting that text of Scripture on the weather vane? Do you mean that God's love is as changeable as the wind?"

"Oh, no," was the reply; "I mean to say that God is love, whichever way the wind blows."

* In a recent contribution to the North American Review, Dr. Cyrus Edson, health officer of New York City, gave this alphabetic rhyme which he learned from one of his patients. While reciting it, he says, the tears would roll down the young man's cheeks as he described the different stages of his own career.

MRS. PETTENGILL'S HUSBAND....

....BY MARGARET E. SANGSTER

THE neighbors dropped in by twos and threes or one by one, until the large sitting-room in the farm-house, and the small parlor on the other side of the hall, were both filled with people. They spoke in subdued tones, or sat in silence, as those do who have come to a house of mourning. In the village and through the whole township, which included West Dingle, North Dingle, East Dingle and the Center, no man had been better known nor more respected than Isaiah Pettengill; yet it had been the misfortune of his long and worthy life to have been always alluded to by the community as Mrs. Pettengill's husband. For an evident reason it is derogatory to any man's dignity to be thus popularly labeled. A man should be the head of his house, should stand in the forefront and face the world for his family, should by no means take second place in the public esteem. Isaiah Pettengill, however, had always been overshadowed by the brisk and capable matron who bore his name. She was attentive, business-like and fond of authority; even her daughters, under their breath, called her domineering, and made haste as soon as they could to make places for themselves outside their mother's sphere. Lucy married at eighteen; Martha was a doctor, practicing in New York; Alice was in a department store there as a saleswoman. There were no sons, and only little Mildred was at home, when her father, sitting, as usual, peaceful and quiet in his chair after supper, leaned back his head, drew a long breath, and was gathered to his fathers. At the moment, Mrs. Pettengill was presiding over a meeting of the Aid Society in the church, and Milly, frightened and amazed, had run to the next house for help. But of earthly help there was no need. Mr. Pettengill, with that tranquil steadfastness in his still face, was far past the storms and breakers of this troublesome world.

"She's shut in the room with him—hasn't seen a soul—won't even speak to Lucy," said one good woman to another.

"The girls 'll be here by eleven o'clock. John Hopper 's got his team ready to go and meet 'em. It 'll be hard on Alice. She favors her pa, and he was very fond of her."

"Hard on all the girls," said Mrs. Nancy Brainerd, who was an intimate friend and connection on the Pettengill side by marriage. "Isaiah really brought 'em all up. Haven't I seen him dress them from top to toe when they were wee tots, and didn't he wait on every child of 'em as if they were princesses? He stood between them and the rough wind always."

"Yes, I think he's aged very fast since Alice went off to work in that big store. No need of it, you know, with this house and the farm, and all Isaiah's money. He sort o' pined for something cheery goin' on, and little Mildred was 'bout the only companion he had, poor man."

So the women talked, in half whispers, while the men sat dumb and compassionate. The instinct of sympathy had brought them to the desolate home. Now, though generally the lights were out, and everybody fast asleep by ten o'clock, the village folk would stay till the late train arrived, and the girls would be at home with their mother.

"To think," said Mrs. Danforth, "Mr. Pettengill was alive and well this afternoon. He called at my door and left my mail at three o'clock, and passed the time o' day, just as he always did. And now he's dead."

Upstairs, in the low-ceiled room where the two, husband and wife, had spent forty-four years together, Susan Pettengill sat beside the bed, her hand touching the icy cheek; her eyes, tearless yet, resting on the frozen brow.

"Isaiah!" she said, "Isaiah!" But there was no movement, no answer. For the first time in their wedded life, her husband was indifferent to her voice. "I wish I had not left you so often, dear," she said; "I wish I had been kinder. I wish you had not gone in such a hurry You always took your time, Isaiah; how could I know you would go and die when I was out of the house? How could I think of such a thing, my dear? My dear, my dear!"

And then the tears came. People knocked at the door, but she did not rise to let them in. People spoke, and called her. She paid no attention. Finally Mildred cried, "Mother, mother, let me come here and stay with you and pa. The house is full of the neighbors. I want to be with you!"

Mrs. Pettengill opened the door on the crack.

"You can't come here, Mildred—not just yet. I've got to be alone with your father. Go to bed, child. It's past your bedtime."

For the first time in her life Mildred disobeyed her mother. Death breaks down the established order. She could not go to bed till the friends were gone, and her sisters had come home. The child crept downstairs again, and nestled close to an old lady who had known much sorrow, and yet had kept serene and strong through it all. Aunty Raymond put an arm around Mildred, and drew the golden head to a resting-place against her soft, gray shawl. Presently the little girl was asleep.

Upstairs, still the widow, looking at her dead husband, went on with her self-reproach.

"You were always so easy and gentle, Isaiah. You let me have my own way. You did not seem to mind, and I marched right over you. I wish I had not. Oh, I wish I had staid with you to-night when you asked me to; you should have told me you were not well; how could I know you were going to die? You never did a thing before without consulting me!"

At last there was the sound of wheels at the door, and the bustle of an arrival. The daughters had come. The neighbors melted out of the house. There was a smell of coffee. Someone had thoughtfully prepared supper for the travelers. After everybody had gone, they sat down together and ate their meal. The mother had been coaxed away from her vigil, and sat down with them.

"Father had angina pectoris," said the daughter, who was a doctor. "He knew he would go suddenly at the last, but he pledged me never to worry you, mother. All his life his study has been not to worry you."

"Yes, I know."

"And he would not want you to grieve, dear; he would want you to keep up, so please won't you go to bed now, and get some sleep. There will be a good deal to do to-morrow."

The mother turned with a look of pale resolution.

"There has always been a good deal to do, and I would never let him do it as he liked. You are all tired, and may go to bed in your old rooms. See that Mildred is made comfortable. I shall stay beside Isaiah, myself."

But one little life to live, friends, and some of us make such tangled work of it. And when it is too late we see our mistakes, and try in vain to make amends. There were no flowers lacking on Isaiah Pettengill's mound in the cemetery, and the village grew familiar with the black-robed figure toiling to visit it, through all weathers, every day. But there were those who thought in their hearts, that Susan might have made him happier while she lived.

"A good man, Isaiah," said an old acquaintance, "but he'd have had a better time if he'd made folks stand 'round more. The Bible says, 'the meek shall inherit the earth.' He never inherited his share, till he lay in his coffin."

That is our way of looking at it. The angels may see more clearly. At all events, in Mrs. Pettengill's later and lonelier years, she has experienced a change of heart. She is sweeter, less imperious, more self-forgetful than once, and one day she said, speaking to an acquaintance,

"I am trying now to be what I wish I had been, when my dear husband was alive. Perhaps he sees me, and cares that I am trying. I like to think so."

BOWERY WAIFS MADE GLAD

Mrs Bird Tells of the Joy and Gratitude Evoked by the Gifts from her Christmas Tree

MANY of our readers will be gratified to read the following entertaining letter from Mrs. Sarah J. Bird. She tells of the recent distribution of gifts from her wonderful Christmas tree, around which hundreds of the little children from the very poorest tenement districts in the lower part of New York congregate every year, on the day which is to them the brightest and happiest of all. For several years past a number of our readers have contributed to Mrs. Bird's famous tree, and they as well as others, will be deeply interested in learning of the disposition of their benevolent gifts. She writes:

DEAR FRIENDS—It is indeed a hopeless task to tell you with pen and paper about our Christmas tree in the Bowery Mission. To be able to appreciate my story you should first see our beautiful mission home. As you enter its door your first impulse would be to praise God that his friends have secured and set apart to his service this noble building. The one prayer of your heart would be that while the world stands, this home may be "kept for the Master's use." To its hospitality comes the stranger, homeless and friendless, from every city and town in our land; every day and every night hundreds come within its doors seeking "a kind word," or perhaps "a letter from home," and it is a privilege to give the friendly hand, for we know it is "somebody's boy." The work carried on in this mission is not local. It should be supported by the Christian fathers and mothers of two continents.

In our mission room there are three big domes which rise, as the little boy said, "to the sky," and in the centre of one of these, stood in its own native dignity, our Christmas tree, twenty feet high; more heavily laden than ever before with all manner of gifts from the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The early morning found the kind friends (many of them members of the Rescue League of the Bowery Mission), mounted on ladders and hanging umbrellas, little stars, and bright, dazzling "nothings," but very soon dolls, big and small, covered every branch of the tree, so that for a time it looked like a big pyramid of living humanity; then mittens, hoods, and all kinds of red and white garments took their own place, and our Christmas tree, unlike any other in the world, had the honor of exhibiting the united industries of all the good friends who read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Was it any wonder, when the long procession of little kindergartners from our settlement came marching in, that they were dazed with the grandeur of their long-looked-for Christmas tree? Then came the kitchen garden girls, and as they caught a glimpse of miniature kitchens, wash tubs, dishes, beds, etc., they sang merrily, "How much we need to learn to work," amid exclamations of delight. After seating our 300 settlement children, who entered by ticket, our hearts turned to the great crowd outside, of unwashed half-clad little waifs, who for hours had watched that Bowery Home, hoping to steal in, and it was enough to open wide the doors of our Mission to all, when we heard a little voice plaintively say: "Please let me just look at a Christmas Tree, for I won't want nothing."

As I looked from the platform upon that crowded mass of children born of every nationality on earth, and knew that they were to be the fathers and mothers of the next generation, it seemed to me that unless this Christian country gives more of the Gospel to its own children here on the East Side, we shall find that we are breeding a people who will destroy themselves, for the "Wages of sin is death." But my heart was cheered as these upturned little faces, gazing upon that Christmas tree, suddenly arose and unitedly sung the story of the Christ who came to save the whole world.

For many weeks our brains were tired planing what our children of the East Side needed most, for past experience had given us perfect faith that in due time the generous gifts would come through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. And you know, faith like unbelief is contagious. One little girl inspired by what she saw and heard at the settlement with regard to higher things, astonished us one morning by applying her knowledge of prayer to material things. She appeared at our door three mornings in succession with the demand (not request), for shoes, for she said she had "ordered them"—in her ignorance this stood for prayer—and, when she appeared the fourth morning, we had just unpacked some things sent, and there was just one pair of shoes in the box, and they fitted her. Will not that lesson stand through all the dark days of that little life, and will it not be a power for good?

I have no words to express our gratitude to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. We must leave the reward to our Father's love.

Yours in His service,
SARAH J. BIRD.

A GOOD PRACTICE.

If You Want a Good Appetite and Perfect Digestion.

After each meal dissolve one or two of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets in the mouth and, mingling with the food, they constitute a perfect digestive, absolutely safe for the most sensitive stomach.

They digest the food before it has time to ferment, thus preventing the formation of gas and keeping the blood pure and free from the poisonous products of fermented, half-digested food.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets make the complexion clear by keeping the blood pure.

They increase flesh by digesting flesh-forming foods.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets is the only remedy designed especially for the cure of stomach troubles and nothing else.

One disease, one remedy, the successful physician of today is the specialist, the successful medicine is the medicine prepared especially for one disease.

A whole package taken at one time would not hurt you, but would simply be a waste of good material.

Over six thousand men and women in the state of Michigan alone have been cured of indigestion and dyspepsia by the use of Stuart's Dyspepsia [illegible].

Sold by all druggists at 50 cents per package.

Free.—A Wonderful Shrub.—Cures Kidney and Bladder Diseases, Rheumatism, etc.

New evidence shows that Alkavis, the new botanical product of the Kava-Kava Shrub, is indeed a true [illegible] in the blood, or by disorders of the Kidneys and urinary organs. A remarkable case is that of Rev. A. C. Darling, of North Constantia, N. Y., as told in the New York World of recent date. He was cured by Alkavis, after, as he says himself, he had lost faith in man and medicine, and was preparing to die. Similar testimony of extraordinary cures of Kidney and bladder diseases of long standing, comes from many other sufferers, and 1200 hospital cures have been recorded in 30 days. Up to this time the Church Kidney Cure Co., No. 409 Fourth Avenue, New York, are the only importers of Alkavis, and they are so anxious to prove its value that for the sake of introduction they will send a free treatment of Alkavis prepaid by mail to every reader of The Christian Herald who is a Sufferer from any form of Kidney or Bladder dis[illegible] Gravel, Pain in Back, Female Complaints, or other affliction due to improper action of the Kidneys or Urinary Organs. We advise all Sufferers to send their names and address to the company, and receive the Alkavis free. To prove its wonderful curative powers, it is sent to you entirely free

To the Readers of This Paper.

For rheumatism, that foe of mankind, I have a simple remedy which cured me after many years of suffering and has since proven its wonderful curative power in thousands of apparently hopeless cases, in fact, so pronounced have been the cures, that multitudes of former sufferers consider it nature's [illegible] for rheumatism. Many a bedridden person, also some who walked on crutches, regained their health through this marvelous cure, and in order that every similarly afflicted reader or their friends may learn about it, I will gladly mail them a trial package with directions for use and other information free, even if more than 15,000 persons should apply. Distressing cases of rheumatism from 20 to 40 years' standing yielded to the benign influence of this remedy of which I mention a few: In Pittsburg, Ind., it cured a druggist whose rheumatism dated back as far as the civil war. In Kenterville, Idaho, it cured a man who was bedridden for 15 years. In Fountain City, Wis., it cured Hon. Jacob Sexaur, a man who suffered for 33 years, notwithstanding employing 7 physicians. In Seguin, Texas, it cured a man who was afflicted for 41 years. In Amsterdam, N. Y., it cured a lady who nearly became insane from pain. Mr. J. T. Carter, of Fork Church, N.C., a reader of the Christian Endeavor World, was quickly cured after suffering untold agonies for many years. Mr. N. H. Spafford, of Newton, Mass., says, that through the kind Providence of the Lord, he was directed to Mr. Smith's remedy and was quickly cured after [illegible] years.

The original letters of above cures, besides thousands of others, can be seen at my office. No one should despair, but write for a free trial package and other information. Address John A. Smith, 851 Summerfield Church Building, Milwaukee Wis.

THE HIGHER FRIENDSHIP*

FRIENDSHIP with the Lord knows no fear of loss; neither life nor death, nor things present, nor things to come can separate us. It is joy and strength in the present, and it lights up the future with a great hope. We are not much concerned about speculations for the future, for we know that we are in the hands of our Lover. All that we care to assert of our future is, that Christ will in an ever fuller degree be an environment of all Christian souls, and the effect of that constant environment will fulfill the aspiration of the Apostle, "We shall be like him, for we shall see him as he is." Communion produces likeness. This even now is the test of our friendship with the Lord. Are we assimilating his mind, his way of looking at things, his judgment, his spirit? Is the Christ conscience being developed in us? Have we an increasing interest in the things which interest him, an increasing love of the things that he loves, an increasing desire to serve the purposes he has at heart? "Ye are my friends if ye do whatsoever I command you," is the test by which we can try ourselves.

Fellowship with him, being much in his company, thinking of him, seeking to please him, will produce likeness, and bring us together on more intimate terms. For, as love leads to the desire for fuller fellowship; so fellowship leads to a deeper love. Even if sometimes we almost doubt whether we are really in this blessed covenant of friendship, our policy is to go on loving him, serving him, striving to please him; and we will receive the assurance, which will yet bring peace; he will not disappoint us at the last. It is worth all the care and effort we can give, to have and to keep him for our friend who will be a lasting possession, whose life enters into the very fibre of our life and whose love makes us certain of God.

To know ourselves ever before a living, loving Presence, having a constant sense of Christ abiding in us, taking him with us into the market-place, into our business and our pleasure, to have him as our familiar friend in joy and sorrow, in gain and loss, in success and failure, must, in accordance with all psychological law, be a source of strength, lifting life to a higher level of thought, and feeling, and action. Supposing it were true and possible, it would naturally be the strongest force in the world, the most effective motive that could be devised: it would affect the whole moral outlook, and make some things easy now deemed impossible, and make some things impossible now to our shame too easy. Supposing this covenant with God were true, and we know ourselves to have such a Lover of our soul, it would, as a matter of course, give us deeper and more serious views of human life, and yet take away from us the burden and the unrest of life.

The human means of communication is prayer, though we limit it sadly. Prayer is not an act of worship merely, the bending of the knee on set occasions, and offering petitions in need. It is an attitude of soul, opening the life on the Godward side, and keeping free communication with the world of spirit. And so, it is possible to pray always, and to keep our friendship ever green and sweet; and God comes back upon the life, as dew upon the thirsty ground. There is an interchange of feeling, a responsiveness of love, a thrill of mutual friendship.

"You must love Him, ere to you
He shall seem worthy of your love."

The great appeal of the Christian is to Christian experience. Loving Christ is its own justification, as every loving heart knows. Life evidences itself: the existence of light is its own proof. The power of Christ on the heart needs no other argument than itself.

ARE YOUR LUNGS WEAK?

To Every Sufferer from Catarrh, Lung Weakness or Consumption a Great Specialist Sends His New and Wonderful

TREATMENT FREE.

Nearly everybody you meet will regard it as a kind of insult to be asked if they have weak lungs. All seem to have a solid faith in the soundness of their own breathing machine. In cases of trouble they will admit there is a "heavy cold," "a touch of bronchitis," or even "a spell of Asthma," but as to weak or unsound lungs, never, NEVER. Even the poor consumptive who scarcely speaks without coughing, whose cheeks are wasted, hollow and bear the hectic flush of doom, will assure you with glistening eyes that his cold is on the mend and he will be all right when the weather changes.

This is a sad and pitiable form of delusion. It is not our business here to discuss the reason of it. Its prevalence, however, is beyond all doubt, and we feel that we are right in holding it responsible for a neglect of serious sible dangers. Nobody can afford to neglect them or "let them wear out," or "get better in the spring," or any other tomfoolery that leads only to wreck and ruin. Lung troubles don't move backward. Weak lungs don't grow strong by themselves—you must heal them and strengthen them and rid them of the very earliest germs of disease or you are simply committing a form of suicide. Either you must cure your lung troubles or THEY WILL KILL YOU.

That's the whole situation in a nutshell.

Never was there a cure for lung troubles equal to the newly discovered Dr. Slocum treatment. This forms a system of three remedies that are used simultaneously, and supplement each other's curative action. The treatment has immortalized Dr. Slocum's name. It cures weak lungs, bronchitis, asthma, coughs, consumption, catarrh and every other ailment

Free to... Christian Herald Readers.

The Dr Slocum Treatment is Medicine Reduced to an Exact Science by the World's Most Famous Physician.

lung troubles in ourselves and others—that it is almost criminal.

How many a poor bread-earner there is who keeps on and on at his daily toil, taking cough medicines by fits and starts, but never quite curing his cough, while this same cough is but a symptom of decay that is eating into his lungs, and will in time cause their destruction. Thus does a wife observe her husband, or parents witness the struggle of a darling child, the youth or the maiden who was to rejoice their later years, while no steps are taken to battle with the evil until consumption has seized on one more victim. It is simply terrible to think how far we may be guilty by our indifference to the lung troubles of those near and dear to us. It is also a sad thought that we may hug a delusion as to our own health that we only get rid of when life itself must pay the forfeit.

Let us quit the distressing subject to come to what is practical. Nobody can afford to think lightly of lung troubles. Nobody can afford to be mistaken about their possible dangers. Nobody can afford to neglect them or "let them wear out," or "get better in the spring," or any other tomfoolery that leads only to wreck and ruin. Lung troubles don't move backward. Weak lungs don't grow strong by themselves—you must heal them and strengthen them and rid them of the very earliest germs of disease or you are simply committing a form of suicide. Either you must cure your lung troubles or THEY WILL KILL YOU.

That's the whole situation in a nutshell.

Never was there a cure for lung troubles equal to the newly discovered Dr. Slocum treatment. This forms a system of three remedies that are used simultaneously, and supplement each other's curative action. The treatment has immortalized Dr. Slocum's name. It cures weak lungs, bronchitis, asthma, coughs, consumption, catarrh and every other ailment of the pulmonary region. It destroys every germ that can affect the respiratory system, and even in advanced stages of lung trouble positively arrests the tubercular growth, while it also builds up the patient so that his system is enabled to throw off scrofula, rheumatism and other wasting diseases. Thousands of cured cases already prove these claims. Thousands of grateful people bless the discovery.

Dr. Slocum wants everybody to know the surprising merits of his system. He has arranged to give a free treatment (three bottles of the cure) to all sufferers who will apply to him by letter, mentioning The Christian Herald. Full instructions for use accompany each treatment. Your correspondence on the subject is strictly private and your three free bottles come to you in a plain package. Surely if you have weak lungs you will be glad to get a free treatment that is offered in such a generous spirit.

A BUGLE-BLAST AGAINST POLYGAMY!

Senator Edmunds Demands that Congress Expel Offenders Against Morality

MORMON TABERNACLE, SALT LAKE CITY

THE MORMON TEMPLE, SALT LAKE CITY

FOR the second time in our history, the hydra of Polygamy has lifted its head in defiance of the American people. Utah, repudiating the sacred pledges it gave as an essential condition of admission to State hood, has not only failed to suppress the crime of plural marriage, but has promoted and encouraged it. Emboldened by apparent public indifference, it lately elected to Congress a notorious polygamist with three wives. This man — a convicted offender — is knocking at the doors of our national legislature, and claiming the right to a voice and vote in making laws for the American people. Public indignation, slow to awake, has been fully aroused in protest against so shameless a proceeding, and the demand is universal and insistent that Congress should exercise its prerogative and purge itself of the contamination. From every State—Utah alone excepted — there comes a mighty note of warning to Congress against the seating of an avowed polygamist as a member of the House of Representatives. As yet, the storm is only rising; presently it will thunder like a Niagara, and our legislators at Washington will do well to give it heed.

At the special request of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, ex-Senator George F. Edmunds, the author of the Anti-Polygamy Act, and the ablest living Constitutional authority, has prepared an opinion on the case of Roberts, the polygamist Congressman-elect, which will be read with appreciation by all who cherish national honor and the sanctity of American homes. Senator Edmunds' calm, judicial exposition and his convincing arguments will have due weight with every reasonable mind. He sounds the call for a national crusade to preserve the honor of Congress and to protect the sanctity of American homes. He writes:

Editor "The Christian Herald":

DEAR SIR:—Your recent letter, asking such explanation as I may be able to give touching the case of Mr. Roberts, recently elected to Congress from the State of Utah, was duly received.

It is now just fifty years since the Mormon political hierarchy was established in Utah. It became an organized territory of the United States in 1850, and seven years thereafter a large military force was required to induce the Mormon territorial government and officers to obey the laws of the United States. From that time onward, until the passage of the Act of Congress of March 22, 1882, the political hierarchy under the form of territorial self-government, grew stronger and stronger, and polygamy had become an established and strong and growing institution in spite of the fact that ever since 1862 there had been in force an Act of Congress making bigamy in that territory, as well as others, a crime, and providing for its punishment. But, so far as I am informed, the Act has remained almost a dead letter, and naturally so, because, substantially, all the machinery of administering justice was under the control, either affirmatively or negatively, of the hierarchy. The Act of 1882 undertook to reform the methods of administering justice and to provide means for bringing to punishment persons guilty of polygamous practices under whatever name they might exist. The Act also provided for excluding from suffrage and from official employment that class of criminals. At the time it was under discussion, it was stated by those having the Bill in charge, that further measures would be brought to the attention of Congress as might appear expedient. And accordingly, Congress passed a supplemental Act on the 3rd of March, 1887, in which it provided, among other things, for annulling the territorial law of Utah, under which illegitimate children inherited the same as legitimate ones.

In consequence of these laws the institution of polygamy greatly declined, and there appeared reason for believing that in a few years this blot upon our civilization would entirely disappear. The hierarchy, however, still continued to control the majority of the voters in the territory, and it was thought unsafe to admit Utah as a State until there should be a decided gentile majority of voters there. But the determination of the hierarchy was continuous, and its efforts for admission persistent, until finally Congress was persuaded to pass the Act of July 16, 1894, authorizing the people of Utah to form a State Constitution and to be admitted.

It is generally known that this was accomplished by inducing Congress to believe that the claim of the hierarchy that polygamy was a divine institution, and a part of the Mormon religion had been abandoned, and that its

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

W. B. H., Hatfield, Pa. What is hypnotism? Is it wickedness or not? Should a person who wants to become a Christian, learn it or not?

Hypnotism is a pseudo-science, by the operation of which an artificial trance-sleep is induced. The person so operated upon is in a somnambulistic condition, and, it is claimed, will act readily upon the direction or suggestion of a stronger will. Hypnotism must be classed in the same category with mesmerism, and is chiefly resorted to by charlatans and humbugs. No benefit can result from investigating it, as it has puzzled the ablest scientists and deluded thousands of the ignorant.

J. B. Eden, Fla. Does the Bible anywhere state how long Noah was building the ark?

The expression in Gen. 6: 3, is generally supposed to refer to the time. God decided to punish man, but gave him space for repentance. He said: "My spirit shall not always strive with man, yet his days shall be a hundred and twenty years." This is the period to which Peter refers (I. Pet. 3: 20). It is only a matter of inference that the building of the ark went on all that time.

W. H. W., Austin, Tex. 1. Can you tell me the author and where this adage was first used? "Blood is thicker than water"? 2. Should two couples of high standing, under any circumstances, take a chaperon when they take a pleasure trip; such as a row on the lake?

1. It is a very old proverb of uncertain origin, but probably [illegible]. 2. While not considered necessary in such cases in this country, she is regarded as indispensable in most European countries. Unless young people are very well acquainted and trust each other fully, it would not be considered entirely proper for them to venture, unattended by some older friend, on any trip that might involve danger.

F. J. C., Eldorado, Kan. What is the Christian Alliance?

The organization grew out of the work of Rev. A. B. Simpson in New York. He preached the four-fold Gospel: Christ our Saviour; Christ our Sanctifier; Christ our Healer; and Christ our Coming King. You will easily see what is implied under each head. Annual conventions were held at Mr. Simpson's church, to which Christians came from other cities, and eventually their reports of the principles and work described at these conventions led to the organization of branches of the Christian Alliance in various places.

Reader, Manayunk, Pa. Where is the saying, "Be bold, be bold, and everywhere be bold," found? Is it from the French?

It is found in Spenser's Faerie Queene, Book 3, canto 11, stanza 54; but it is quite possible that it may have originally been borrowed from the French proverb.

Mary F., Paterson, N. J. My husband talks of going to the Klondike but I try to persuade him to stay at home, though times are very dull here. We hear from some people who have gone from this section, that everything is at famine prices at the diggings. Kindly advise us if this be so.

You are doubtless wise in advising as you do. Only a very small proportion of those who go hunting gold succeed in their expectations, and it would be unwise for anyone to surrender an assured position and invest the savings of years in what is very likely to prove a wild-goose chase. Prices at the Alaskan mines at last accounts were at almost fabulous figures—a bowl of soup costing $1, a steak $3.50, pie and coffee, $1.25, and other food in proportion. These figures are from a report on file in the Department of Labor at Washington.

A. E. J., Denton, Tex. 1. How could a slave become Empress of China, as is reported? 2. What foundation is there for the statement that Lazarus after his resurrection lived to be an old man and was a preacher of the Gospel?

1. The Emperor of China is allowed to have several wives, and the late Emperor chose for one of his wives the singularly intelligent slave, who now, as his widow, rules the empire. 2. None worthy of credence. There is an old tradition to that effect in Epiphanius and another of a totally different character in Fabricius, but nothing in the New Testament to confirm them.

Mrs. W. W. C., Buda, Texas. What is the Laocoon supposed to represent?

The Laocoon is a famous group statue, of a son of Priam and his two sons in their death struggle with the serpents. It has been interpreted to represent man's struggle when in the power of sin and vice.

Mrs. T. A. Jones, Marcellus, N. Y., sends this interesting letter:

I have a dear old Bible. It contains the English prayer-book, the Old Testament, the Apocrypha, the New Testament, two books of concordance, and the Psalms of David in verse, with tunes; all bound in one volume, in heavy dark leather binding. The paper is the thinnest and finest I ever saw. The type is very clear, old English type, and looks like the German. It was printed in London, by "Robert Barker, Printer to the King's Most Excellent Majesty, in year One Thousand Six Hundred and Thirteen." The New Testament bears the same date, 1613, but the first book of concordance after a rather lengthy preface finishes thus, "Signed by me this day, December Twenty-eight, Fifteen Hundred and Seventy-five." My father gave it to me on my sixteenth birthday. He said when I could read a chapter without a blunder, I should have it. I coveted it for its great age, so I won it. I have given it to my youngest brother's youngest son, with the understanding that it shall never leave the family, but be handed down from father to son.

GENERAL VIEW OF PARLIAMENT HILL, OTTAWA, ONT.

On this eminence about 160 feet high, are the Parliament Buildings. The hill is skirted on the east side by the Rideau Canal, on the south side by the city proper, and in front by the Ottawa River. This photograph of the buildings, recently taken, shows the cluster as a whole, presenting an architectural effect hardly rivalled anywhere on this continent.

Thomas, Reading, Pa. When and by whom was the first prayer offered?

The first prayer uttered by human lips was probably associated with the first offering of sacrifice. The earliest instance is mentioned in Gen. 4: 26, during the lifetime of Enoch: "Then men began to call upon the name of the Lord."

H. S. P., Ilion, N. Y. When a person has lived as near right as he could, and has been happy, but suddenly becomes despondent, what ought he to do?

It largely depends on the cause of his despondency. If he has realized that living "as near right as he could," will not satisfy God, he can get rid of his despondency by availing himself of the remedy provided for just such persons. Christ came into the world to save the lost, and he will save all who put their trust in him, howsoever they may have lived. There is no reason for despondency when God assures the sinner of pardon through Christ.

B. W. L., Bridgeport, Conn. 1. If man was created immortal, could he have sinned? 2. Is there any other way of attaining immortality except through Christ? Please give definite answers.

1. We have no knowledge on which to found a definite answer save that contained in the Bible story. If you believe that, you must admit that Adam did sin, and also that as stated in Gen. 3: 3 death was the penalty. The terms of the warning imply that otherwise he was not subject to death. 2. Eternal life is attain[illegible] distinct intimations in the New Testament of the continuous existence of the impenitent which does not come through Christ. "These shall go away into everlasting punishment" [illegible] ever and ever" (Rev. 20: 10), and there are other passages implying the existence beyond the grave of those who die in their sins.

Student, Providence, R. I. 1. At what depth of the sea are the waves felt? 2. What is the pressure at great sea-depths?

1. Scientific observers say that waves are appreciably felt at a depth of 3,000 feet. 2. At the depth of a mile, the pressure is equal to fully a ton to the square inch.

We have information that many readers have adopted the suggestion recently made in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for addressing the President urging action looking to cordial co-operation in the proposed International Peace Conference. The briefest and probably the best form of letter that has yet come to our attention is the following:

This is a model of conciseness, and might well be adopted by others who purpose writing to the President on the subject.

W. P. E., Mitchiner, N. C. Do not some people celebrate Christmas on January 6?

The Epiphany is celebrated on that day. The word signifies showing or manifestation, and is applied to the worship of the wise men which is supposed, but without any basis of authority, to have taken place twelve days after our Lord's birth.

N. B., Beverly, Mass. In what sense could the prophecy of the coming of Elijah (Mal. 4: 15), be fulfilled by John the Baptist?

The work he did was similar to that of Elijah. He called on men to repent, to forsake their sins, and turn to the Lord. He came in the spirit and power of Elijah, and, like the older prophet, was an ascetic.

Old Subscriber, Hutchinson, Kan. 1. What is the significance of the prediction (Gen. 3: 15) about the seed of the woman bruising the serpent's head and having his heel bruised? 2. Also of Acts 9: 5: "It is hard for thee to kick against the pricks?" 3. Of what nation were the three [illegible] Matt. [illegible]

1. That in the conflict with evil then admitted into the world, the principle of evil would finally be crushed, but only at the cost to the victor of infinite suffering. 2. The simile is to the sharp goad used in driving oxen. If the ox kicked against it, he hurt himself. Paul was learning that his resistance to Christ and his people was an injury to his own soul. 3. Not known. Some have supposed that they came from Arabia, others from Mesopotamia, and others from Persia. An old tradition goes so far as to name them, but it is without evidence

J. M. C., Tampa, Fla. Are we to understand from Luke 11: 13, that the Holy Spirit will be given to all who ask?

Yes, if the request is made in the proper spirit. The prayer would not be answered, for instance, if offered by a man living in sin, nor [illegible] preciate the coming of the divine Visitant [illegible]

[illegible] and Thummim, mentioned Ex. 28: 30? 2. What [illegible] (II Kings 21: 6)?

1. They are supposed to have been two stones in the high priest's breastplate, which were consulted by the priest, and according as they glowed or became dim, the answer to a prayer was inferred. 2. An idolatrous ceremony sometimes involving the burning alive of a human victim. In the case of the king's son, he would probably be passed through the flame so as not to hurt him.

This interesting letter is from a very young reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD:

CALUMET, Mich., Jan. 7.

Dear "Herald":—If you can, please tell me in THE MAIL-BAG, the address of our Lord Jesus? I questioned my dear Papa about it, but he said "he [illegible] our Lord in fifty years, although he is not born in America. But I and my brothers and sister are [illegible] Finland and he is examined in many high schools in Europe and he is a much learned man; but his countrymen here are all unlearned and peasants. My Pa has made many ministers for them, but now he says he must leave his ministry, because his throat is sick. I wish to write to our Lord about this matter and tell him all, for Pa is too proud to depend upon men. But I am anxious about the address. I hope you know that.

The Lord Jesus is in heaven, but he is [illegible] and always. With his own lips he assured us of this when he said: "Lo, I am with you alway even unto the end of the world" (Matt. 28: 20). Access to him is easy (Mark 6: 6), and he not only tells us what to ask, but adds, repeatedly, that whatsoever His believing followers ask in his name, will be granted (John 14: 13, 14 and 16: 23, 24). Jesus himself answers the prayers of those who trust [illegible] to earnest believing prayer are [illegible] to little ones, who are followers of the Saviour, as well as to [illegible] Carry all your troubles to him and he will not fail you, but you should always pray that you may ask according to God's will (I. M. H., Tygh Valley, Ore. [illegible] to understand that [illegible] spiritual body? 2. At what period did Flavius Josephus live and [illegible] meaning of the word death?

1. The expression is used by the Apostle Paul (I. Cor. 15: 44), in contrast with the natural, or physical, body, and he represents it as being conferred at the coming of Christ. He speaks of the dead being raised with a spiritual body and the living being changed. From this we infer that in that day, the believer, whether he be living or dead, will receive some such body as Christ had after his resurrection. Until death, or until the coming of Christ, we believe that no man has a spiritual body in that sense. 2. He was born A. D. 37, and is believed to have lived until 103. 3. A Bugle-Blast... ...Against Polygamy practice had substantially ceased, and, therefore, that Utah ought to be admitted.

The only condition in the Enabling Act was that Utah's constitutional convention should provide by an ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of Utah, that while religious liberty should be sacred, "Polygamous or Plural Marriages are forever prohibited." The constitutional convention, held pursuant to this Act, adopted an ordinance in the very words of the requirement I have quoted, and the convention made all the territorial laws of Utah then in force, a part of the State law.

The Territorial Laws

But in respect of the territorial Act of the 4th of February, 1892, defining and punishing polygamy, etc., the convention adopted that Act only so far as it applied to polygamous marriages; the effect of which was, following the very words of the Act of Congress, to punish only the crime of contracting a polygamous or plural marriage, the proof of which, owing to the peculiar methods of the hierarchy, it had been found almost impossible to make in prosecutions under the Acts of Congress. This difficulty had led Congress in the Acts referred to, to reach the evil by providing for the punishment of unlawful cohabitation.

Since the admission of the State, which was completed by the President's proclamation of the 4th of January, 1896, I have never heard of any State prosecution in respect of any of the Acts related to the subject, and it is well understood that the Mormon hierarchy is in just as complete possession of the State in all respects as it was before the Acts of Congress passed in 1882 and 1887. This domination is not confined to matters of religious belief or worship, but extends to all the civil and political operations of the State—a concentration of power in a few hands which is perhaps without a parallel in any government having a written constitution and professing to be a government of the people.

Utah's Bad Faith

It is now evident enough that Congress was mistaken when it passed the Enabling Act in supposing that polygamous notions had disappeared, and that the State would go on in the same way as other States. Congress also must have overlooked the fact that any engagements on the part of the State of Utah as a condition of its admission to the Union relating to the administration of its internal affairs would not be binding in point of law, and could only bind the faith of the State Government, for a breach of which the only redress must be the forcible overturning of the State Government, which would be simply war. The instant the State was admitted, every act of Congress relating to its internal policy ceased to have any force whatever. The consequence is that in point of law, the State of Utah has the same sovereign rights that any other State has. She may punish polygamy or unlawful cohabitation, or she may authorize it. She may declare, as Congress had done, that illegitimate children shall not inherit, or she may declare as she appears to have done since her admission, that illegitimate children shall inherit on an equal footing with legitimates.

Roberts' "Plural Marriages"

The Constitution of Utah only prohibits the ceremony of making a polygamous or plural marriage. It does not prohibit the carrying on of polygamous relations. Nor do her laws go any further, so far as I can ascertain. In fact she is, as I have said, absolutely independent of Congress in respect of the subject, and she appears, from all reports, to be steadily taking advantage of her opportunities, and has, if reports are true, deliberately elected to Congress a person in the open and notorious practice of polygamy. I am not informed at what time these alleged polygamous marriages took place, nor is this material to the question. If they took place before the State was admitted, Mr. Roberts could have been punished by the authorities of the United States. But he can not be now. The Acts of Congress, while they punish cohabitation with plural wives, did not punish and were not intended to punish those who had been in the practice of polygamy for supporting those who had been their unlawful wives; but they did provide for punishing a continuance of the polygamous relation. If Mr. Roberts' polygamous marriages took place after the State was admitted, he would be guilty of violating the State law in contracting such marriages, but he would not be guilty of violating any State law in living as a husband with all his plural wives, for, so far as I am informed, there is no such law of Utah. In any case, as is true everywhere, statutes restraining crime are of no value unless there be a state of government, executive and judicial, willing and desirous to execute the law and bring offenders to punishment. It would seem clear from what has transpired, that the Government of Utah has no disposition to proceed in that direction.

In this state of things, you ask: What can the House of Representatives do in the case of Mr. Roberts? The Constitution of the United States provides that the House of Representatives shall be the judge of the election and qualifications of its members. The power to judge of the election is merely the power to ascertain whether a majority of the legal voters have in the manner provided by law voted for the member, and that is all. The qualifications of the member are three.

His Right to Admission

He must be twenty-five years of age; he must have been seven years a citizen of the United States; he must have been at the time of his election an inhabitant of the State. Of these three requisites the House is the judge. If he possesses these, the House has, in my opinion, no lawful power to apply any other or further test in respect of his being admitted to a seat. It would be extremely dangerous for a Constitution to give a majority of a House the right to determine what particular sort of man the people of a State should have the right to elect to represent them further than our Constitution has declared.

How he may be Expelled

This is too obvious to require illustration. But when a man so elected and possessing the qualifications required by the Constitution has once taken his seat, the Constitution brings into play another and entirely different provision, authorizing the House, with the concurrence of two-thirds, to expel a member. Upon the exercise of this right, the Constitution wisely imposed no limitation except that of requiring the concurrence of two-thirds to expel. If, therefore, the House of Representatives shall find on due inquiry that Mr. Roberts is an open, practical and persistent polygamist, and the House thinks that in view of that fact, and in connection with the circumstances under which Utah was admitted, or without reference to these circumstances, it will be a reproach to its dignity and good name to continue Mr. Roberts as a member, it may lawfully and rightfully expel him. If it does not act at all (supposing the facts to be as stated), it will have given its acquiescent approval of the conduct of Mr. Roberts, and of the action of the people who elected him with full knowledge of the circumstances, and henceforth it will be justly considered that the House has no disposition to interfere with the practice of polygamy in Utah. If it does act, and expel the member, it will have declared against the perpetuation of that system.

Utah being now a sovereign State, with all the power of any other State, neither House of Congress, or the whole government of the United States, can do anything further, except by the act of war to which I have already alluded.

Very truly yours,

GEORGE F. EDMUNDS.

Elected by the Mormon Church

Roberts' nomination for Congress, it is said, was brought about through the influence of the Mormon Apostle, Heber J. Grant and the "Church of the Latter Day Saints." His record was well known, and it was decided to make an aggressive campaign and exert all the influence of the Mormon hierarchy to secure his election and admission in Congress. Repeatedly the church was urged to withdraw him from the race, but it refused. In the very crisis of the campaign, the Governor of Utah, who is not a Mormon, wishing to avert the shame that would come upon the State from such a choice, pleaded with the people not to elect the avowed polygamist; but the Mormon power was supreme, and Roberts was triumphantly elected.

Brigham H. Roberts, according to the published accounts, has contracted three marriages. His wives are Louisa Smith Roberts, Celia Dibble Roberts and Margaret C. Shipp Roberts. The two first named live in Centreville, near Salt Lake City, and the third is a practicing physician in that city. In February, 1887, he was indicted by the Grand Jury of the United States before the Third District Court of Utah, for continuous and unlawful cohabitation, "with more than one woman as his wives." The indictment was filed Feb. 14, a warrant was issued the same day, he was arrested on the fifteenth of the same month, but was not arraigned until April 29, 1889, when he entered a plea of guilty. On May 1, 1889, he was sentenced to four months' confinement in the Utah penitentiary and a fine of $200.

The entire Protestant clergy of the State of Utah have united in an effort to defeat the Mormon plans, and have issued a statement exposing, in no measured language, the general condition of the Mormon element in Utah to-day. That statement among other matters, says:

"Of such cases ('celestial' or 'plural marriages'), more than 2,000 have come to our notice, and this living has resulted in the birth of more than 1,000 children since Statehood was granted Jan. 4, 1896. Religious adultery goes unpunished and the 'kingdom' grows apace. From the heads of the church down polygamy flourishes. It teaches that men may become gods by practicing adultery under the euphonious title of 'plural' or 'celestial' marriages. Mormonism is both anti-Christian and anti-American."

The Kinsman (a Gentile weekly paper, published in Salt Lake City), in an article entitled, "The Edge of the Situation," puts the Roberts case in a nutshell, in these words:

"If the Mormon theory of marriage is right, then we ought all to follow the Mormon priesthood and rely on Prophet, Seer and Revelator Snow for guidance in every spiritual and temporal concern. If the people of the United States are right on the question of marriage, then the Mormon god is a polygamous adulterer whose 'chief glory' is the commission of crime. If the people of the United States are right, this god exists only in theory and for the purpose of masking the lust of the Mormon, Melchizedek priesthood."

"The election of B. H. Roberts is the practical challenge of Mormonism on the question of whether plural marriage is a virtue or a crime. How are we going to answer the challenge?"

One year ago, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published a remarkable series of articles from the able pen of General John Eaton, ex-United States Commissioner of Education, whose long official residence in Utah had given him unusual facilities for studying the Mormon question in all its aspects. That publication stirred the country deeply, and opened the eyes of the people to the real nature of the Mormon danger. We were deluged by an avalanche of letters from every State in the Union, inquiring as to the best measures to be adopted in dealing with the Mormon propagandists, hundreds of whom are actively at work poisoning the minds of unsuspecting persons in many communities.

This general agitation had hardly subsided, when the candidacy of Roberts gave it new vitality. Christian churches of different denominations, all over the land, have now taken up the anti-polygamy crusade, and, at the present time, it is the absorbing topic.

For the information of its readers, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has requested Gen. Eaton to make public his views on the case of Roberts, and he has complied in an important article which will appear in next week's issue.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

A SUMMER-HOUSE TRAGEDY

A Sermon by Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Judges 3: 15:

But when the children of Israel cried unto the Lord, the Lord raised them up a deliverer, Ehud, the son of Gera, a Benjamite, a man left-handed: and by him the children of Israel sent a present unto Eglon the king of Moab.

EHUD was a ruler in Israel. He was left-handed, and, what was peculiar about the tribe of Benjamin, to which he belonged, there were in it seven hundred left-handed men; and yet, so dexterous had they all become in the use of the left hand, that the Bible says they could sling stones at a hair's-breadth, and not miss. Well, there was a king by the name of Eglon, who was an oppressor of Israel. He imposed upon them a most outrageous tax. Ehud, the man of whom I first spoke, had a divine commission to destroy that oppressor. He came, pretending that he was going to pay the tax, and asked to see King Eglon. He was told he was in the summer-house, the place to which the king retired when it was too hot to sit in the palace. This summer-house was a place surrounded by flowers, and trees, and springing fountains, and warbling birds. Ehud entered the summer-house, and said to King Eglon that he had a secret errand with him. Immediately all the attendants were waved out of the royal presence. King Eglon rises up to receive the messenger. Ehud, the left-handed man, puts his left hand to his right side, pulls out a dagger, and thrusts Eglon through until the haft went in after the blade. Eglon falls. Ehud comes forth to blow a trumpet of liberty amidst the mountains of Ephraim; and a great host is marshaled, and proud Moab submits to the conqueror, and Israel is free. So, O Lord, let all thine enemies perish! So, O Lord, let all thy friends triumph!

I learn first, from this subject, the power of left-handed men. There are some men who, by physical organization, have as much strength in their left hand as in their right hand; but there is something in the writing of this text which implies that Ehud had some defect in his right hand which compelled him to use his left. Oh, the power of left-handed men! Genius is often self-observant, careful of itself, not given to much toil, burning incense to its own aggrandizement; while many a man, with no natural endowments, actually defective in physical and mental organization, has an earnestness for the right, a patient industry, an all-consuming perseverance, which achieve marvels for the kingdom of Christ. Though left-handed, as Ehud, they can strike down a sin as great and imperial as Eglon.

I have seen men of wealth gathering about them all their treasures, snuffing at the cause of a world lying in wickedness, roughly ordering Lazarus off their door-step, sending their dogs, not to lick his sores, but to hound him off their premises; catching all the pure rain of God's blessing into the stagnant, ropy, frog-inhabited pool of their own selfishness—right-handed men, worse than useless—while many a man with large heart and little purse, has, out of his limited means, made poverty leap for joy, and started an influence that overspans the grave, and will swing round and round the throne of God, world without end: Amen.

Ah, me! it is high time that you left-handed men, who have been longing for this gift, and that eloquence, and the other man's wealth, should take your left hand out of your pocket. Who made all these railroads? Who set up all these cities? Who started all these churches, and schools, and asylums? Who has done the tugging, and running, and pulling? Men of no wonderful endowments, thousands of them acknowledging themselves to be left-handed, and yet they were earnest, and yet they were determined, and yet they were triumphant.

But I do not suppose that Ehud, the first time he took a sling in his left hand, could throw a stone at a hair's-breadth, and not miss. I suppose it was practice that gave him the wonderful dexterity. Go forth to your spheres of duty, and be not discouraged if, in your first attempts, you miss the mark. Ehud missed it. Take another stone, put it carefully into the sling, swing it around your head, take better aim, and the next time you will strike the centre. The first time a mason rings his trowel upon the brick, he does not expect to put up a perfect wall. The first time a carpenter sends the plane over a board, or drives a bit through a beam, he does not expect to make perfect execution. The first time a boy attempts a rhyme, he does not expect to chime a "Lalla Rookh," or a "Lady of the Lake." Do not be surprised if, in your first efforts at doing good, you are not very largely successful. Understand that usefulness is an art, a science, a trade. There was an oculist performing a very difficult operation on the human eye. A young doctor stood by and said, "How easily you do that: it don't seem to cause you any trouble at all." "Ah," said the old oculist, "it is very easy now, but I spoiled a hatful of eyes to learn that." Be not surprised if it takes some practice before we can help men to moral eye-sight, and bring them to a vision of the Cross. Left-handed men, to the work! Take the Gospel for a sling, and faith and repentance for the smooth stone from the brook: take sure aim, God direct the weapon, and great Goliaths will tumble before you.

When Garibaldi was going out to battle, he told his troops what he wanted them to do, and after he had described what he wanted them to do, they said, "Well, general, what are you going to give us for all this?" "Well," he replied, "I don't know what else you will get, but you will get hunger, and cold, and wounds, and death. How do you like it?" His men stood before him for a little while in silence, and then they threw up their hands and cried, "We are the men! we are the men!" The Lord Jesus Christ calls you to his service. I do not promise you an easy time in this world. You may have persecutions, and trials, and misrepresentations; but afterward there comes an eternal weight of glory, and you can bear the wounds, and the bruises, and the misrepresentations, if you can have the reward afterward. Have you not enough enthusiasm to cry out, "We are the men! We are the men!"

I learn also from this subject the danger of worldly elevation. This Eglon was what the world called a great man. There were hundreds of people who would have considered it the greatest honor of their life just to have him speak to them; yet, although he is so high up in worldly position, he is not beyond the reach of Ehud's dagger. I see a great many people trying to climb up in social position, having an idea that there is a safe place somewhere far above, not knowing that the mountain of fame has a top like Mont Blanc, covered with perpetual snow.

We laugh at the children of Shinar for trying to build a tower that could reach to the heavens; but I think, if our eye-sight were only good enough, we could see a Babel in many a door-yard. Oh, the struggle is fierce. It is store against store, house against house, street against street, nation against nation. The goal for which men are running is chairs, and chandeliers, and mirrors, and houses, and lands, and presidential equipments. If they get what they anticipate, what have [illegible] while they live, and, worse than that, they are not safe after they are dead; for [illegible] One day a man goes up into publicity, and the world does him honor, and people climb up into sycamore-trees to watch him as he passes, and, as he goes along on the shoulders of the people, there is a waving of hats and a wild huzza. To-morrow the same man is caught between the jaws of the printing-press and mangled and bruised, and the very same persons who applauded him before, cry, "Down with the traitor! down with him!"

Belshazzar sits at the feast, the mighty men of Babylon sitting all around him. Wit sparkles like the wine, and the wine like the wit. Music rolls up among the chandeliers; the chandeliers flash down on the decanters. The breath of hanging gardens floats in on the night air; the voice of revelry floats out. Amidst wreaths, and tapestry, and folded banners, a finger writes. The march of a host is heard on the stairs. Laughter catches in the throat. A thousand hearts stop beating. The blow is struck. The blood on the floor is richer-hued than the wine on the table. The kingdom has departed. Belshazzar was no worse, perhaps, than hundreds of people in Babylon, but his position slew him. Oh, be content with just such a position as God has placed you in. It may not be said of us, "He was a great general," or "He was an honored chieftain," or "He was mighty in worldly attainments;" but this thing may be said of you and of me, "He was a good citizen, a faithful Christian, a friend of Jesus." And that in the last day will be the highest of all eulogiums.

I learn further from this subject that death comes to the summer-house. Eglon did not expect to die in that fine place. Amidst all the flower-leaves that drifted like summer snow into the window; in the tinkle and dash of the fountains; in the sound of a thousand leaves fluting on one tree-branch; in the cool breeze that came up to shake feverish trouble out of the king's locks—there was nothing that spake of death, but there he died! In the winter, when the snow is a shroud, and when the wind is a dirge, it is easy to think of our mortality; but when the weather is pleasant, and all our surroundings are agreeable, how difficult it is for us to appreciate the truth that we are mortal! And yet my text teaches that death does sometimes come to the summer-house. He is blind, and cannot see the leaves. He is deaf, and cannot hear the fountains. Oh, if death would ask us for victims, we could point him to hundreds of people who would rejoice to have him come. Push back the door of that hovel. Look at that little child—cold, and sick, and hungry. It has never heard the name of God but in blasphemy. Parents intoxicated, staggering around its straw bed. Oh, Death there is a mark for thee! Up with it into the light! Before those little feet stumble on life's pathway, give them rest.

Here is an aged man. He has done his work. He has done it gloriously. The companions of his youth all gone, his children dead, he longs to be at rest, and wearily the days and the nights pass. He says, "Come, Lord Jesus, come quickly." Oh, death, there is a mark for thee! Take from him the staff, and give him the sceptre! Up with him into the light, where eyes never grow dim, and the hair whitens not through the long years of eternity. Ah! Death will not do that. Death turns back from the straw bed, and from the aged man ready for the skies, and comes to the summer-house. What doest thou here, thou bony, ghastly monster, amidst this waving grass, and under this sunlight sifting through the tree-branches? Children are at play. How quickly their feet go, and their locks toss in the wind. Father and mother stand at the side of the room looking on, enjoying their glee. It does not seem possible that the wolf should ever break into that fold and carry off a lamb. Meanwhile an old archer stands looking through the thicket. He points his arrow at the brightest of the group—he is a sure marksman—the bow bends, the arrow speeds! Hush now. The quick feet have stopped, and the locks toss no more in the wind. Laughter has gone out of the hall. Death in the summer-house!

Here is a father in mid-life; his coming home at night is the signal for mirth. The children rush to the door, and there are books on the evening stand, and the hours pass away on glad feet. There is nothing wanting in that home. Religion is there, and sacrifices on the altar morning and night. You look in that household and say, "I cannot think of anything happier. I do not really believe the world is so sad a place as some people describe it to be." The scene changes. Father is sick. The doors must be kept shut. The death-watch chirps dolefully on the hearth. The children whisper, and walk softly where once they romped. Passing the house late at night, you see the quick glancing of lights from room to room. It is all over! Death in the summer-house!

Here is an aged mother—aged, but not infirm. You think you will have the joy of caring for her wants a good while yet. As she goes from house to house, to children and grandchildren, her coming is a dropping of sunlight in the dwelling. Your children see her coming through the lane, and they cry, "Grandmother's come!" Care for you has marked up her face with many a deep wrinkle, and her back stoops with carrying your burdens. Some day she is very quiet. She says she is not sick, but something tells you you will not much longer have a mother. She will sit with you no more at the table, nor at the hearth. Her soul goes out so gently you do not exactly know the moment of its going. Fold the hands that have done so many kindnesses for you right over the heart that has beat with love toward you since before you were born. Let the pilgrim rest. She is weary. Death in the summer-house!

Gather about us what we will of comfort and luxury. When the pale messenger comes, he does not stop to look at the architecture of the house before he comes in; nor, entering, does he wait to examine the pictures we have gathered on the wall; or, bending over your pillow, he does not stop to see whether there is color in the cheek, or gentleness in the eye, or intelligence in the brow. But what of that? Must we stand forever mourning among the graves of our dead? No! No! The people in Bengal bring cages of birds to the graves of their dead, and then they open the cages, and the birds go singing heavenward. So I would bring to the graves of your dead all bright thoughts and congratulations, and bid them sing of victory and redemption. I stamp on the bottom of the grave, and it breaks through into the light and the glory of heaven. The ancients used to think that the straits entering the Red Sea were very dangerous places, and they supposed that every ship that went through those straits would be destroyed, and they were in the habit of putting on weeds of mourning for those who had gone on that voyage, as though they were actually dead. Do you know what they called those straits? They called them the "Gate of Tears." I stand at the gate of tears through which many of your loved ones have gone, and I want to tell you that all are not shipwrecked that have gone through those straits into the great ocean stretching out beyond. The sound that comes from that other shore on still nights when we are wrapped in prayer makes me think that the departed are not dead. We are the dead—we who toil: we who weep: we who sin—we are the dead. How my heart aches for human sorrow! this sound of breaking hearts that I hear all about me! this last look of faces that never will brighten again! this last kiss of lips that never will speak again! this widowhood and orphanage! oh, when will the day of sorrow be gone!

After the sharpest winter, the spring dismounts from the shoulder of a southern gale and puts its warm hand upon the earth, and in its palm there comes the grass, and there come the flowers, and God reads over the poetry of bird, and brook, and bloom, and pronounces it very good. What, my friends, if every winter had not its spring, and every night its day, and every gloom its glow, and every bitter now its sweet hereafter! If you have been on the sea, you know, as the ship passes in the night, there is a phosphorescent track left behind it: and as the waters roll up, they toss with unimaginable splendor. Well, across this great ocean of human trouble Jesus walks. Oh, that in the phosphorescent track of his feet we might all follow and be illumined!

Concerning Some Domestic Tyrants

BY AMELIA E. BARR

THERE are no people to whom we feel so hard and unforgiving as to the wilful preventers of Happiness. They may not bring us real calamities, but they do make the days that might have been joyous and profitable, days of worrying, and nagging, and unfruitful endurance. And the worst of this domestic tyranny is that it ruins and dwarfs really fine natures, by its perpetual fault-finding and its dictatorial absolutism. Women, in this respect, are quite as much to blame as men; exhibiting a selfish authority, which is the outcome not of affection, but of imperative, self-complacent disposition.

For instance: Some mothers, in the pure selfishness of their love, will not allow their children the ordinary amusements of youth. They must not skate, because they might get drowned; or ride, because the horse might run away; or row, because many young men injure themselves in those dreadful boat races; or play ball, because accidents are always occurring. They cannot have a dog, for it might go mad; or take a long walk among the woods or mountains, for fear of snakes or tramps. Work and play are alike dangerous to these timid, selfish, fretful autocrats; and to save themselves a little of that loving, prayerful care with which other mothers surround their growing boys and girls, they deprive theirs of that healthy sense of freedom and adventure so necessary to their finest development.

Another kind of Domestic Tyrant, is always fretting her children about their health. She mortifies them with comforters around their throats, and knitted muffs around their wrists, and flannel in all kind of places where flannel will not stay. She is sure they have a cold or are going to have one; and the aconite bottle, and the mustard leaf are always at hand. If delicate boys, but their father insists on them "roughing it." Fagging and hazing, are good for them. He rather enjoyed the fun. Exposure, physical training, mental cram, are only "hardening" and he approves them with the vaunting commentary, "Look at me! I don't know anything about nerves! I never had a headache! I can walk twenty miles at a stretch!"

If the mother should be a physical tyrant of this kind, she is a still more offensive, selfish thing. She boasts of her iron constitution continually. Usually, such a woman has a nervous, sensitive husband, whom she harries into despair; and fragile children, to whom she makes life a burden. She is a "crushing" woman; pitiless in all her relationships; a woman without any of those delicate, unconscious considerations for others, which make more frail, sympathetic mothers, so heroic and so loveable.

Much has been said lately about a "healthy animalism" for parentage; but too often hard, unwise parents spring from this source. They gallop over a thousand fine feelings they can not comprehend, and leave in every step, the mark of their hoofs on tender little hearts; because they have an utter want of that delicate sympathy, which a superior moral organization—not often compatable with rude vigorous animalism—bestows. Their dwellings have a constant atmosphere of east wind, full of bluster and brag. The sweetest, most wholesome homes, are frequently ruled by women, frail, sensitive, loving, and seldom free from pain. Yet their husbands love their homes, their children are remarkable for their consideration; their friends are singularly familiar. Boys are unconsciously humanized by having to respect a mother's headache; and girls learn many things they go into the country, they may not sit on the grass or stay out in the sunshine. They are forbid to go under trees for fear of lightning, and may not stay out after dark for fear of malaria. They never know the joy of being in that good, wet northeaster, which Charles Kingsley called "the wind of God." In fact, they are so hedged in by advice and warnings, so limited by directions as to times, and places, and people, that all their pleasures are shorn of the atmosphere of freedom, and they bring to every recreation a nature fretted to pieces by restrictions. Such children have far too much of their mother's love; because, it considers first of all, her own selfish fear of being made anxious or uneasy. Self-sacrifice is too painful an endeavor, and so she sacrifices her children under the specious pretence of an extraordinary affection for them.

The Domestic Tyrant, full of coarse health and vigor, is a cruel destroyer of Home Happiness. He does not know what sickness is, and he does not believe in the sickness of his children. The boys of such men are frequently in natural ways, by having often to take mother's place. Between the physical tyranny of healthy animalism, and the sweet considerate patience of a delicate woman, there is no comparison, as far as the happiness of the home is concerned; though the combination of the two—the strength of the one the sweetness of the other—is, where it does exist, the most desirable of all.

A lady whose children all did remarkably well, was asked on what system she had brought them up, and her answer is worth the consideration of parents. "As soon as my babies were able to hold by a chair, I showed them that I expected them to take good care of themselves. I never 'ran to help them when they fell.' I let them pick themselves up. If they were hurt, I did not 'kiss the place to make it well.' I tried to make them laugh at their bumps. I gave them pocket money as soon as they could speak plain, and they had learned the value of money by the time they had grown up. I let them read any book or paper that came into the house, and talk to me about them. I allowed them to sit alone, if they wished to do so. I let them choose their own friends. I have always found them defer to my wishes in every respect. They are helpful, condding affectionate, and grateful." Is not this a better result, than the enforced obedience of any species of Domestic Tyranny?

mother" of one of the homes. As we had received no money for this district, we have decided to appropriate THE CHRISTIAN HERALD readers' money for its support.

The "Kuzzel-bash" Koords are an extremely interesting people, although very uncivilized. There are the ruins of churches among them, and their villages have Christian names. They are Moslems only in name. They do not observe the fast of Ramazan, nor the ceremonial ablutions, nor the five daily Moslem prayers. A select few, who are free from glaring faults, constitute a sort of church; and they have occasional secret meetings on Friday evenings, at which bread and water are passed around after the manner of the Lord's supper. This is perhaps a relic of the Christian communion. They profess great reverence for Ali, the son in-law of Mohammed, like the Persians; but some of them say that the name was orignally adopted instead of Christ's name as a blind to the Mohammedans. With a Christian civilization, they would become one of the finest races in the empire.

We now have under our care in different parts of this missionary field nearly 1,100 orphans. It is a great care, but no part of our work is more full of encouragement. There are still many more for whom no provision has been made, and as there are no relief funds in hand this year, and as the price of grain is double the ordinary price, there will be great suffering and actual starvation among the very poor this winter. H. N. BARNUM.

The first of Mr. Barnum's enclosures is a letter from an Armenian girl, Sultan Kalezigian, which translated into English reads:

PERI, Nov. 3, 1898.

Christian Friends:

With grateful heart I offer to you deep thankfulness that I enjoy many good things through your means. Now I pray that the Most High God would give to you wisdom, strength and ability, that you may grow and flourish all the days of your life. I am grateful to you that you have sheltered an unworthy servant like me, in this comfortable home. I pray to God that he would give me a perfect heart, that I may be able to love my companions as myself, for the Lord often said: "Love your companions as your own souls."

A GIRL ORPHAN

As the poor Lazarus rested in the bosom of Abraham, I also wish when death comes, to rest with my Father, where the saints and angels live, and to be like them.

I offer my last thankfulness to you. I am grateful that you make glad an orphan like me. I pray that my Heavenly Father will give me a perfect and humble heart, that I may be like a tree planted by the waters that brings forth good fruit, so that my Father in heaven may be glorified. SULTAN KALEZIGIAN.

The second is a boy's letter:

My Noble Benefactor:

I esteem it a debt to express to you the sincere gratitude of my heart. I was a wanderer from street to street, hungry for a piece of bread. But God called an orphan like me to the delights of this home, and you from distant places, send to me food and clothing and other things, thus caring for me. You have given to me a father and mother who cherish me, both spiritually and temporally. They do all that is necessary, that in the future I may be able to take a worthy position.

I also, with hands opened up towards heaven, express my thankfulness, and pray that for a recompense of your goodness, God would open his loving doors, and from his never-failing treasury grant you abundant gifts, both temporal and spiritual.

God has said: "Whoever gives a cup of cold water in the name of a disciple, shall not lose his reward."

Therefore, now I entreat, and I am confident, that he will hear the voice of an orphan like me, and will grant my petition, and will reward you. Again I express my gratitude and salute you. I remain yours, always grateful, Peri, Nov. 2, 1898. ABRAHAM HACHIGIAN.

One of the most touching sights that could be witnessed was a pitiful little girl orphan, all in rags and tatters, who came to the Harpoot Home, and whose photograph Mr. Barnum has also enclosed. This wretched little waif is now clean, clad, fed and happy. Her portrait is given on this page.

GRATEFUL LITTLE ORPHANS

Two Touching Letters from Harpoot, Conveying Thanks to "Christian Herald" Readers

REV. H. N. BARNUM, one of the American missionaries at Harpoot, Armenia, sends us the following letter, acknowledging the receipt of the latest remittance from the Armenian Orphan Fund, and enclosing two letters, written by an orphan boy and girl under his care:

HARPOOT, Turkey, Dec. 14, 1898.

Editor "The Christian Herald":

Your favor of Oct. 13th, with check for $150 for orphans, was duly and most gratefully received.

Ten miles to the north of us is the east branch of the Euphrates. The Anti-Taurus Mountains are not far beyond. That whole district was once inhabited by a thrifty Christian population. There are still a good many Armenians living there, but they are oppressed by feudal chiefs who have taken possession of the district, and they are surrounded by "Kuzzel-bash" Koords. There is no district in this part of the country where the Christians have so hard a lot as in this, the "Charsanjak district." The Turkish chiefs have taken possession of their houses and lands, and the people who once owned them—or their descendants rather—are simply serfs, while the Koords, although they doubtless had a Christian ancestry, plunder them as they have opportunity. The chief town, the seat of the local government, is Peri. We have recently opened two homes for the poor waifs in that district, for twenty boys and the same number of girls. A photographer has recently visited the place, and he took the pictures of the children. I enclose a copy of each. The male and female teachers are at the left. The man who sits at the left of the boys, is the good brother who has the general care of both orphanages without pay, while the woman who sits at the left of the girls, is the "House

THE NOBLEMAN'S SON

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 5. John 4: 43-54
Golden Text, John 4: 53

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

AFTER his momentous conversation with the Samaritan woman, the Lord Jesus remained with the Samaritans at their request two days, where many "believed on him for the saying of the woman, He told me all things that ever I did . . . And many more believed because of his own word: and said unto the woman, Now we believe, not because of thy saying, for we have heard him ourselves, and know that this is indeed the Christ, the Saviour of the world" (John 4: 39–42). Two days! This seems a short time for such a work! "Many believed;" and "many more believed," and yet he went away and left them! Was it not just the time to stay when such an awakening had begun? Our beloved Lord did not "judge after the sight of his eyes, neither reprove after the hearing of his ears;" he was "of quick understanding in the fear of the Lord" (Isa. 11: 3). He was on the track of his Father's will which he was quick to understand.

How much hangs on that word "For," which commences verse 44! The Father who was always with him and whom he always pleased, had shown him that he should go not where it was easy and where he was appreciated, but into his own country, just where a prophet does not have honor. Why? Because the spirit which actuated him would manifest itself under the tests which he would meet with just where he was not appreciated. More glory would come to his Father, and more deliverance to a lost world, by the proof that under the most difficult tests, "tempted in all points like as we are," he still remained "without sin" (Heb. 4: 15), than in the salvation or healing of numerous individuals. What he proved himself to be through the Father dwelling in him, is a guarantee for all who would follow him that they can be the same: what he did in blessing to individuals touched those individuals only.

A transient acceptance among his own people awaited him. "When he was come into Galilee, the Galileans received him, having seen all the things that he did at Jerusalem at the feast: for they also went unto the feast:" the sin of Jeroboam in hindering them by the setting up of the golden calf of Bethel had long ceased. But, as his journey through Samaria had a definite purpose, already arranged for him by the Father, so now this journey into Galilee. He knew where to go and why. Sent of the Father, he came unto Cana of Galilee, where he had made the water wine. There was in the city of Capernaum, not very far distant, a man who sorely needed him: he was a nobleman, accustomed to command: he had heard of Jesus, the Carpenter, Prophet and Healer, and he besought him to come down and heal his son.

The case was urgent: his son was at the point of death. And yet the answer of Jesus seemed to imply that he did not recognize the urgency of the situation. "Except ye see signs and wonders ye will not believe." "Sir, come down," was the impatient reply of the anxious father, "ere my child die." "Go thy way; thy son liveth: And the man believed."

It was not callousness, which led the Lord to deal faithfully with the nobleman at this critical moment. At Nazareth he did not many mighty works because of their unbelief (Matt. 13: 58). In Mark 6: 5, 6, it is yet more strongly stated, "He could there do no mighty work . . . and he marveled because of their unbelief." "Sir, come down," was the nobleman's request preferred with much of authority. It was met with a counter command. "Go thy way; thy son liveth." This was a refusal to meet the nobleman on his own terms, or to be in any way subservient to him on account of his high earthly position. The movements of the Lord Jesus were directed by higher considerations, to please, not rich men who would patronize his ministry, but his Father which was in heaven. While he would offer to come down to the centurion who did not think himself worthy that such an One should come under his roof, he would not come down to the house of the nobleman.

RUINS ON THE SITE OF CAPERNAUM

Are there not many Christians who will do things sometimes in order to keep in with rich and influential people? How far this is from the spirit and the example of the Lord Jesus! If he would go into Galilee, his own country, for the very reason that a prophet is not accepted in his own country, if he who was always at home with the poor, would not unnecessarily enter the houses of the rich, do we not learn that there is a danger of getting off the highway of faith and coming to depend upon man if we allow any such power to govern us as may bring us under the power of man? The clearly perceived will of God, according to the Scriptures, is our safe guide, and that without turning to the right hand or to the left to admit any side light or lower consideration.

"Go thy way; thy son liveth." This was the test, and the nobleman stood it, and was all the stronger in his faith because things did not come to pass as he had arranged them. He believed the Word, and did not take offence that his own plan was upset. This is a great point. If we have made a plan of the way in which God shall deliver us or our dear ones, and God in his providence goes right across our plan, and we get depressed at it, there is strong evidence that we do not really believe. We build on our plans, and not on the power and wisdom of God. And thus the nobleman teaches us a lesson.

The nobleman went his way, and as he was going down to Capernaum, no very long journey, his servants met him, and told him the very words which Jesus had spoken, "Thy son liveth." And when he inquired of them the hour when he began to amend, they answered, "Yesterday at the seventh hour the fever left him."

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers

SEVERAL features of this miracle deserve notice. The chief is, that like the healing of the centurion's servant, recorded Matt. 8: 5-13, which occurred at Capernaum and is often confused with it, it was worked without contact with the sufferer. There could have been no magnetic or hypnotic influence in this case, such as critics sometimes allege in accounting for miracles. The sufferer was twenty miles away, and there is no reason to suppose that he had heard of Christ, or exercised any faith in him, or even knew that his father had gone to ask Christ's aid. The father had evidently a kind of faith. He believed in Christ's power. Christ noted the fact, in his remark about the signs and wonders, and apparently deplored that it went no further. Perhaps this was the reason that he put the nobleman to the test. He may have wished to see whether he would trust his word. The father's hope had been to bring the Healer to his son's bedside. Would he believe that his son could be healed without his coming? Apparently he did, for he did not hurry home. He was approaching it on the following day, when his servants met him with the news. Then, John says, the nobleman believed. One would have said he believed before this. A man would not travel twenty miles to bring a healer, if he did not believe in him. But this was a different kind of faith. It was the kind of belief Jesus wished to see. The belief in him not as a miracle-worker, but as Saviour and Lord. This was the object for which the miracles were worked. But unhappily, it was seldom accomplished. The people wondered at the miracles, but did not, like the nobleman, learn from them to trust in the Worker.

Besought him to come down. Like Naaman, the nobleman had settled in his own mind the course the healing would take. Christ would go to Capernaum and would stand by the bedside of the sick boy and would heal him. He had to learn that even in granting his petition Christ would take his own way. A young business man in a time of financial straitness went to a millionaire in New York and described the crisis in his affairs. "What do you want me to do?" the millionaire asked. The young business man, who kept his account at the same bank as the millionaire, produced his checkbook and filling out a check in his own favor for ten thousand dollars, offered it to the millionaire, saying, "If you will sign that, it will put me right." "I don't think it will," said the millionaire. But the young man was quite sure, and eventually persuaded the millionaire to write his name on the check. Half an hour afterwards he returned, complaining that he did not get the money, and came near being arrested. "I expected you would," was the reply. "You thought you knew best, but you see the bank and I have an understanding that I shall never use the printed forms for checks, but always write the whole on a piece of plain paper. Now let us talk your situation over and I will decide what is the best way of helping you." Many a man has learned, as Paul did in the matter of his thorn in the flesh, that God chooses his own way of answering prayer.

Believed the word. Men are often kept back from peace by not doing this. A great preacher tells the story of a boy who insulted and abused his father and left his home. The very next day he repented, went back home and said to his father: "I am sorry for what I said. Can you forgive me, father? I will never offend you again." The father freely forgave him and the son remained at home contented. Some years afterward the son lay on the field of Gettysburg severely wounded. His father found him and the son said, "Father, I am going to die and I am afraid. Tell me what I must do." The father recalled the boyhood incident and told him to speak to God in the same way as he had spoken when he returned home. "Is that all?" said the sufferer. "You believed me when I said I would forgive you," said the father, "and you have more reason to trust God." There was silence for some time and then the son murmured, "The peace of God which passes all understanding."

Himself believed. This was a different kind of faith from that the nobleman had when he set out to seek Christ's help for his son. If the question were put to a hundred persons on the street of one of our cities, "Do you believe in Christ?" the answer of the majority would probably be in the affirmative: yet it might be that very few of them could claim the name of Christians. A story is told of the head master of a great public school which illustrates the difference in kinds of faith. The boys knew him to be learned, but they thought him severe and hard-hearted and needlessly strict. They would deceive him when they could, and would use the books, called "cribs," which saved them study. They disregarded his lectures and paid no more attention than they were obliged to pay to his orders. But one day a boy in the school was badly hurt in the play-ground, and some one ran to tell the master. He came instantly and sent one of the boys to fetch a doctor. While he waited for the doctor to come, he took the injured boy in his arms, tenderly bound up his wound and comforted and cheered him. The boys looked on in wonder. They had never seen the master in that light before. "Why, he loves us!" one of them said in amazement. From that time there was a different spirit in the school. The boys trusted him, respected him, and followed his instructions. They had come to believe in him.

MRS. J. CALVIN MEAD

IN response to many readers asking further particulars regarding officers and work of New York Assembly of Mothers, and New York City Mothers' Club, we publish several letters written by leaders of the movement to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD: the first being that of Mrs. D. O. Mears, President of the Assembly. Mrs. Mears is also President of the Mothers' Association (organized 1833), of the Fourth Presbyterian Church of Albany, of which her husband, Rev. Dr. Mears, is pastor:

The object of the Assembly is to promote conference among parents and teachers upon questions vital to the best interests of the home and school; to stimulate active interest in all that pertains to the highest development of the physical, mental, and spiritual welfare of the child; and to these ends to promote the formation of Mothers' and Homemakers' Clubs in all parts of our State. There are prosperous Mothers' Clubs in different cities of New York State, studying along educational and philanthropic lines. There are others connected with the churches and still others associated with city mission work, endeavoring to bring comfort and blessing into the lives of many mothers, having few advantages compared with their more favored sisters.

The Assembly is little more than a year old; it was organized soon after the National Congress of Mothers in February, 1897, and its first Annual Convention was at Syracuse, September, 1897. The officers, besides myself, are: Mrs. J. C. Mead, Oswego, and Mrs. E. H. Merrell, Syracuse, Vice-Presidents; Mrs. Almon Hensley, New York City, Recording Secretary; Mrs. F. H. Chase, Syracuse, Corresponding Secretary; Mrs. F. J. Bailey, Albany, Treasurer. Chairmen of Committees are: Mrs. M. L. Wright, Oswego, Philanthropy; Mrs. Mary Stone Gregory, Utica, Kindergarten and Child Study; Mrs. E. A. Tuttle, New York City, Nature Studies; Mrs. S. M. Harris, New York City, Hygiene; Miss Etta Lansing Wentz, Albany, Physical Culture; Miss Laura A. Skinner, New York City, Press; Mrs. M. C. Coon, Oswego, New York, Reforms; Mrs. Almon Hensley, New York City, Moral Training; Mrs. A. H. Brockway, Brooklyn, Education; Miss Mary Louisa Butler, Chautauqua, Schools and School Laws; Mrs. F. J. Bailey, Albany, Temperance; Mrs. Mary Seymour Howell, Albany, Reading Circles. The officers of the Mothers' Assembly of the State of New York highly appreciate the interest taken by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers in our work.

The Syracuse Mothers' Club is doing excellent work, as is shown in the following account, supplied by courtesy of Mrs. Franklin H. Chase, one of the Vice-Presidents:

The Syracuse Mothers' Club was started in May, 1897. Its officers are: Mrs. E. H. Merrell, President; Mrs. E. M. Mitchell, Ph. D., Mrs. W. M. Ross, and myself, Vice-Presidents; Mrs. A. M. York, Secretary; Mrs. D. J. Francis, Treasurer. Dues are fifty cents a year which we use for books and philanthropic work. We have a nice library — many books having been donated. Have also fifty volumes from Albany traveling-library. In the Fall of 1897, when we were new and small in numbers, we undertook the formidable task of inviting to our city the first New York State Mothers' Assembly, which proved a success. We have now sixty or seventy members. Last summer we planned and raised funds for the carrying on of a summer play-ground, which was more than successful. It was open, under the charge of Mrs. Marie Louise Clark, a most efficient kindergartner, for six weeks with an average daily attendance of 400 children. One day we had 800. We think this the finest work we have done and mean to do it again next summer. We meet twice monthly; have first-class lectures by physicians and other able speakers. We are now undertaking extension work—establishing mothers' meetings in our schools. I have that work in charge.

Mrs. Maurice L. Wright, of the Oswego Mothers' Club, writes:

The Mothers' Club in this city was organized March, 1897. Able and interesting papers have been presented from time to time, followed by free discussion. Much effort has been made to bring the home and the school in closer relationship. A proof of the interest in this movement is clearly shown by the fact that the mayor of the city gives the Council Chamber in the City Hall for the meetings. Professors and teachers in our Normal School are giving their time and thought and influence to this work. Efforts are made in the Club to reach the poor mothers, and we co-operate with the truant officer to see that the children are clothed and kept in school, and we further seek to bring into their lives something that will brighten them and make their homes happier. It is a great work; its possibilities in all directions are practically limitless.

GROUP OF OFFICERS OF THE NEW YORK CITY MOTHERS' CLUB

MRS. FANNIE J. BAILEY — MRS. E. A. TUTTLE

MRS. LILLIE DEVEREUX BLAKE

The New York City Mothers' Club, of whose work previous mention has been made in this paper, antedates the State organization, and is really the parent of the latter. Affiliated Clubs are forming in Brooklyn, New Rochelle, Staten Island, Jersey City, and other neighboring localities.

"Homes for the Homeless" was the subject under discussion at the January meeting, of which Mrs. Lillie Devereux Blake was Chairman. The Club is considering ways and means for providing homes and home influences for the city's great army of homeless working girls. All the officers of State and city organizations are leaders in church, temperance, and philanthropic work, thus bringing vast funds of practical experience in many lines to the prosecution of the Mother Club movement. Mrs. Harris, the city Club's President, organized the first Kindergarten Association of New York, having studied kindergarten methods for the benefit of her own children; for ten years she was in charge of the kindergarten at the Friends' Seminary, and still prepares young women to do kindergarten work. One of the most interesting personalities of the Club is that of Mrs. Rebecca Kohut, President of the Jewish Council of Women of New York. This lady, a representative Hebrew woman, delivered a remarkably interesting address before the last National Congress of Mothers. Mrs. Tuttle, apart from her official work, is conducting Mother Meetings at the Madison Square Church House (the Third Avenue Mission of Dr. Parkhurst's Church). Of other activities there, in line with this work, she says:

I have had a class of women for many years. We meet on Wednesdays to sew. It is very enjoyable and happy work. They give me more help and strength than it seems I give to them—though they come to me with all their cares and sorrows. I visit and do what I can for them. They are wonderfully self-sacrificing in giving to the "Needle-work Guild," of which I am a Section-President. In the Helping-Hand I have about fifty members, who contribute to this beautiful charity two new garments every year. They knit socks and stockings and do other sewing for this work.

"Christmas," Mrs. Tuttle added, incidentally, "was a delightful family gathering at my home; twenty children and grandchildren clustered about myself and my husband. Yet I feel that I have much to learn from other mothers and grandmothers, and surely I ought to have much to give them!" Mrs. Bailey, Treasurer of the State Assembly, and Chairman of the Committee on Temperance, is the mother of a prominent preacher in Albany, and has been conducting Mother Meetings in church work there for a number of years. It will be understood from this sketch that the women who have this movement in hand are such as to promise that it will be one of wide and profound effectiveness in helping the world to be better, for "the hand that rocks the cradle rules the world." In other States besides New York, the movement is gaining, and affiliated Mother Clubs are being organized in foreign countries—Japan, for one. Mrs. Birney, President of the National Congress of Mothers, writes:

Many beautiful and inspiring things have happened since my last letter. We are receiving encouragement from many directions, and I believe we will have a wonderful meeting at our Congress which convenes Feb. 14, in Washington. Please make a point of the fact that we want the co-operation of the fathers. We want the Congress of Mothers to develop into a Parents' Congress.

Mrs. Birney is quite right in urging this point, and that her wish may come true is a thing to be prayed for. A Virginia Mother Club woman sends this plea:

"Fathers' Clubs," as well as "Mothers' Clubs," should be formed in every church, in all social and Gospel settlements, in rural villages and country neighborhoods. The father represents a certain influence and power in the home that the mother cannot, just as she represents certain qualities that he cannot; and he represents a power in State government that the mother does not. It is important that parents meet together, and confer as to what sort of schools they want for children, how they can co-operate with State, church, teachers, and humane societies for their welfare, with what measures to influence society for their good, and how best to reach children of the slums and purify the streets through which children walk, and by whose atmosphere they are contaminated. Parents of the slums must be helped to a more intelligent realization and discharge of responsibilities.

Expansion

EVERYBODY in these days is talking or thinking about expansion. However widely statesmen may differ on the question, there is one phase of it upon which all intelligent people, much more all Christians, are agreed, and that is soul-expansion. We may or may not share in the feelings which prompt the gloomy prophecies of Senators Hoar, Vest and others: but it is very certain that for the soul that has ceased to grow, nothing remains but disaster. From infancy to childhood, from childhood to maturity is the physical process, and woe to those who do not have a corresponding mental development! who are not continually advancing from narrowness towards liberality, from stinginess towards generosity, from sin towards holiness, from selfishness towards love! Arrest growth at any stage and you kill life: so, cease to expand in affections, in knowledge, in faith, and the decay begins: the ears are dulled, the conscience is seared, the heart is petrified. In this sense, no Christian can be an anti-expansionist; he must ever press forward towards a fuller and grander realization of the glory of the infinite God.

No Precedent for To-day

THERE was a time in the history of the church when it was necessary to reinforce every statement and to buttress every doctrine by quotations from "the fathers" and appeals to the "traditions of the elders." Such a period seems now to have been reached by us as a nation. We hear much of the constitution and of Washington's Farewell Address: nor, indeed, can we ponder those documents too carefully. And yet the answers to the questions confronting us at the close of the nineteenth century are not to be found in the writings of those who died at the end of the eighteenth. The extreme of conservatism is as dangerous as the extreme of imperialism. No unprejudiced person believes that Washington would have written his address as it stands, word for word, had he been penning it to-day. Everybody knows that we have read into our constitution meanings of which its framers were quite unsuspicious. And wisely, for the constitution is not a cast-iron fetter, but a plastic mould which can be adapted to varying circumstances. The best principle for our guidance now is to act in the spirit of our forefathers; remembering that the letter killeth: "doubting not that thro' the ages one increasing purpose runs and the thots of men are widened with the progress of the suns;" believing that in some things, after a century of Christian culture and experience, after finding permanent what our fathers tried as an experiment, we may be able to decide the new questions that present themselves at least as prudently as those who lived a hundred years ago could decide them for us. They faced their problems and solved them. It were better for us to imitate their conduct than to seek to secure our ease by indolently invoking their authority. The fear of a mistake should make us cautious and humble, but the conviction that we are laboring to carry out God's will should make us bold and hopeful. There is as truly a message of cheer and help from the nineteenth century to the twentieth, as there was from the eighteenth to the nineteenth. As long as there is room for improvement, as long as God rules, a brighter day is ever coming.

The City Door-Bell

THERE is something thoroughly honest in the stroke of the old-fashioned knocker. The visitor would let it fall thrice, and then everybody in the house, from garret to cellar, would know that somebody wanted to get in. But the knocker has been banished from all our city houses, and from many of the country houses, and the door-bell substituted. No doubt there are honest door-bells and door-bells which are a blessing, but in our crowded thoroughfare they become unprincipled and a nuisance. When one is solitary or sad it is a relief to hear one of them jingle. But to a busy life they become a pest, sometimes almost unendurable. When they call us to genial sociality, or to sympathy with the grief-struck, or to a pastoral duty, they are to be honored: but they sometimes seem to be bent on making a man crazy. We have often gone out through the kitchen way while our reception-room was full, and taken the railroad and gone fifty miles out of town to escape its perpetual assault and battery. We have for the same purpose taken a steamer for Portland or Charleston. When we had a barn on our premises on the outskirts of the city we sometimes went there to escape the tintinnabulation. One of our anticipations of heaven is that there will be an utter appeasing of this nuisance. There it goes now! And it has been going all day. First a printer's boy from a book-publisher: then one of the same kind from a newspaper, both of these chaps asking for more copy. Then came a woman whose husband is out of work, and wants to know if we can get him employment. Poor souls! How we should like to help them!

Then there came a committee wanting a lecture. Another committee wanting us to speak at an indignation meeting. To save time we deliver the indignation speech there and then, only two for an audience. Next, a couple to be married: next, a boy with a shoe bill. Absurd! we have nearly worn them out, and do you expect us to pay for such an old pair of shoes as that? Next, a man who wants to lecture, and would pay us well if we would furnish him a manuscript. Dear fellow! We are not in the brain-brokerage business. Clatter and bang again at the door. This is a fierce man, whose child has been sick for three weeks, and is infuriate that we did not know it, and have not been around with pastoral condolence. By this time we are getting excited, and the door-bell sounds to us as loud as a gong. A lady is opening a boarding-house, and she wants to know if we know any boarders. At her departure we take a long breath of relief and are about returning to our study, when clatter goes the bell. A book agent! We see the ominous bundle, and say, "Thank you! Don't open it! Don't want to buy." But he says, "You need not buy. Only let me show it to you." "Thank you, we have no time to look at it." "It won't take more than a minute, to look at it. All the other clergy have taken the book. You had better let me put down your name for a copy." "Thank you: we have all the facts of the book in other volumes." "But I want your name. It will help me very much with your congregation. By-the-way, would you give me a list of the more prominent names of your church?" "No: we cannot give a list." "Well, sir, let me present you with a copy of this book, and then put your name on my subscription-book." "No sir! our putting our name down implies that we have purchased a copy, and that would be a falsehood." "Well, you certainly want to help in the distribution of good literature, do you not?"

At this point we get unbalanced and cry out, "Sir, we have been pestered today with a long procession of bores, but you are the biggest of the lot! Now get out of the house." That was the first remark that made any salutary impression, and he went out of the room, not exactly shaking off the dust of his feet against us as witness, but leaving the mud of his clodhoppers on carpet and stairs. Then comes in a procession of people wanting money for churches, for asylums, for engine-houses, for the poor: others wanting letters of recommendation or introduction: others wanting autographs: others wanting nothing. You say, "Appoint certain hours when you must not be interrupted." That plan works only imperfectly. There are persistent fellows who will not be turned away. They persuade the door-servant that it is a matter of life and death that we be seen. If their card be brought to us they are sure we will see them. They gestulate so violently that the servant gets afraid. She has been only a little while in the family, and does not feel like being sacrificed, even in defense of the peace of the householder. Her courage fails and she timidly knocks at the pastor's door. After the urgent case is stated it is found out that the visitor has a new kind of cough-mixture which he wanted to introduce into the family. Meantime, when are you to prepare your Sabbath sermons and weekly lecture? If your sermons are poor, these interlopers will be the first to set up a howl at the poor fodder. If you have newspaper connections, or relations to some educational institution, what justice can you do them?

Amid these disturbances we once so lost the order of the day that we dined twice, forgetting that we had been at the table before, the second time chiding ourselves for poor appetite, which seemed to indicate declining health. There are two practical uses of writing all this. First, to persuade congregations not to be too sharp when their pastors have poor sermons. If you had one-half the interruptions and botherations your minister has you would not preach any better than he does, and would be so confused you could not answer the questions in Brown's "Shorter Catechism" as to who made you and what you were made of. Furthermore, let those who sit reading by the country fireside, the flames sissing and surging about the great back-log, have their gratitude stirred by the fact that they live two miles from town and have on their house, instead of a restless, fidgety, impertinent, rickety door-bell, a calm, deliberate, old-fashioned Christian door-knocker.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

THE PHILIPPINES PROBLEM

BY deciding to send a non-partisan commission to the Philippine Islands, to study the situation and suggest the best method of dealing with the people, President McKinley has proved his disposition to act fairly and wisely in the crisis. The determined attitude adopted by the insurgents at Iloilo, on the island of Panay, the largest town except Manila in the whole group, shows that the utmost care and tact are needed in dealing with the problem. It seems certain that if Gen. Miller had persisted, on his arrival at Iloilo, in landing the troops with which by command of Gen. Otis he was to take possession of the town, there would have been bloodshed. It has even been stated that the insurgents were prepared to burn the town, rather than surrender it into American hands. Gen. Miller, therefore, prudently refrained from precipitating a conflict, and contented himself with occupying a position, from which the guns of his ships could act with effect, if it became necessary. At Manila there is the same danger of hostility. The extremely moderate and conciliatory manifesto, issued by Gen. Otis, evoked a reply from Aguinaldo, the insurgent leader, in which he declares unequivocally his defiance of American rule, and his determination to struggle for absolute independence. How far he has the support of the people of the islands in this attitude, cannot at present be ascertained. That there is a certain class who would aid him, may be assumed. There are in the Philippines, as everywhere else, men who are ambitious to govern and are concerned about their own interests, rather than about the welfare of the country. These would be with Aguinaldo, who is himself somewhat of an adventurer. It is said that the property-holding class have no desire for the rule of Aguinaldo which would probably lead to a condition similar to that of the Central American Republics, but would prefer the strong and equitable government of the United States. There can be no doubt that if the people prove to be fit for self-government and there is no danger of violence and anarchy, our government will give them independence, but we are in duty bound not to deliver them over to a tyranny which might be worse than that from which we have set them free. The unkindest thing we could do would be to leave them liable to a calamity such as that which befell the man of whom Christ spoke, who being delivered from one devil, fell under the tyranny of eight.

Then goeth he and taketh unto him seven other spirits more wicked than himself; and they enter in and dwell there; and the last state of that man is worse than the first (Luke 11:26).

A COAST SCENE AT ILOILO, THE SECOND LARGEST TOWN IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS

An Unpleasant Resemblance

A prosperous Wall St. broker is concerned about a portrait in the Rogue's Gallery at Detective head-quarters in New York. He was going to lunch a few days ago, when a detective put his hand on his shoulder and ordered him to accompany him to Capt. McClusky's office. The broker indignantly refused and demanded to know what offense was charged against him. "None at present," said the detective, "but you have no right to be in Wall St. Your portrait has been in the gallery too long for you to be allowed to wander among these banks." The broker saw it would be useless to argue, so he agreed to go with his captor. But on the way uptown, he asked the detective to step with him into an insurance office that they passed. There, he was promptly and positively identified, and the detective being satisfied, apologized. But he said the resemblance between the broker and the portrait of a notorious criminal was sufficient to account for the mistake. Anxious Christians sometimes indulge in needless cares about their future, but they have no cause for fear of such a mistake:

The Lord knoweth them that are his (II. Tim. 2:19).

Why the Gun Burst

The inventor of the great gun which burst while being tested by the Government Inspectors in New York recently, gives a plausible reason for the accident. Dr. Gatling says that the gun was made of the best material and he was convinced when it was taken from the mold, that a perfect casting had been produced. The gun was then heated preparatory to boring, which process was to be witnessed by members of the Ordinance Board. At the last moment they notified him that they were unable to be present on that day, but would attend four days later. The question then arose whether the gun should be allowed to cool and be re-heated or should be kept in the furnace until the day fixed. The latter course was deemed best. When the gun was bored, specimen pieces of the boring were tested and it was found that the tensile strength was sixty thousand pounds to the square inch, instead of one hundred thousand. Dr. Gatling contends that this deficiency was the result of the gun being kept in the furnace four days longer than usual. The trials of Christians are often compared to the fierce heat of a furnace, but we are assured that painful as they are, they are never as in the case of this gun, continued longer than is good for them.

God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able to bear (1 Cor. 10:13).

A House-Moving Feat

A feat, said by contractors to be unprecedented in the records of house-moving, has just been performed in Upper New York. It has been decided to widen Willis avenue by forty feet. At the point where it is intersected by One Hundred and Thirty-fourth street, stood four five-storied brick houses seventy feet deep. Thirty feet of their depth was condemned, and it was supposed that the houses would have to be pulled down. But as they had cost $64,000, the owner was reluctant to lose them. He sent for the architect who had drawn the original plans and asked him if it was possible to move them. The architect said it could be done safely and undertook the task. The houses were separated from their foundations, and with jack-screws were raised four feet. Underneath them were placed ways filled with soap. The houses were let down into them and the jack-screws applied laterally. They traveled forty feet, when they were again raised to foundations prepared for them. The architect says that there is not a crack in any of the walls, and in a few days they will be ready for occupancy. Our forefathers would not have believed that such a movement was possible. Perhaps some of the scientific men of our own time, who argue learnedly against the possibility of life after death, will be similarly astonished when they learn that the houses our souls inhabit, can by divine power be fitted for occupancy in another place:

Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you, that God should raise the dead (Acts 26:8).

A Physician's Fortune

A decision in a Surrogate's Court at Kingston, N. Y., settles a dispute as to an inheritance of a quarter of a million dollars. It arose out of a will in which the testator left the whole to his physician. It was disputed by the testator's half-sister who claimed as the nearest relative. The evidence showed that the testator was taken ill while spending a few days at a hotel at Kingston. He sent for a physician, who, in spite of the fact that his patient was poor and unable to pay full fees, watched him through a serious illness and gave him the most devoted attention. The patient after his recovery, remained at Kingston, to be near his physician whose kindness had won his affection. Quite unexpectedly, an uncle who had taken no notice of him during his life died, leaving him his entire fortune. He was anxious then to show his gratitude to the physician who now finds that his friend has left him a quarter of a million dollars. The reason assigned for the bequest is that the physician befriended him when he was poor and when all his relatives neglected him. The decision of the Surrogate upholds the will. The court evidently thought that there was nothing unnatural, or improper, in the testator passing over his relatives, or choosing as his heir, the man who had befriended him in sickness and poverty. It is not often that such service is so richly rewarded in this world, but Christ assures us that it will be in the next:

Then shall the King say unto them on his right hand, Come ye, blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you; for I was an hungered and ye gave me meat; I was a stranger and ye took me in; I was sick and ye visited me (Matt. 25:34-36).

Needles as a Penance

A press despatch from Chicago says that a remarkable patient is in one of the hospitals of that city. She has undergone an operation for the removal of a needle from the walls of her stomach, and is slowly recovering. This is the third needle which has been removed from her body, and it is believed that several more yet remain, which cannot be located until the Roentgen rays are called into service. The girl says that she was born in Germany, and was educated in a convent there. Her mother emigrated to the United States, leaving her in the convent to finish her education. After she graduated, she rejoined her mother here. She complained of internal pains, and on being pressed to explain the cause, said that she had not behaved well at the German convent. Whenever she broke a rule of the institution she pricked herself with a needle as a penance, and at last fixed needles in the inner belt of her skirt-waist where they would penetrate the flesh. Some of these needles disappeared, and she concluded that they had buried themselves in her body. How much suffering she would have been saved if she had learned the lesson reiterated in God's Word, that it is not by self-torture, nor by works of any kind, that sin is forgiven, but through faith in Christ!

To him that worketh not, but believeth on him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is counted for righteousness (Romans 4:5).

A Habit of Drowning

A policeman made a singular complaint against a prisoner in the Harlem Police Court recently. The man had fallen into the water from the scow on which he was employed and only by the united efforts of the policeman and two bystanders had been saved from drowning. The policeman said that the man was an habitual drunkard, and whenever he was drunk at his work he was liable to fall overboard. He had already been rescued several times by men of the precinct. The prisoner did not deny the charge. He spoke gratefully of the exertions the officers had made in saving his life. He could not swim and would certainly have been drowned if they had not saved him. The magistrate lectured him on the risk he ran, and urged him to stop drinking lest sometime when he was drunk and fell overboard he might lose his life. "Stop drinking is it, your honor?" replied the prisoner, "I had rather fall overboard." He must love drink very much when, not even to save himself from death will he give it up. We think him foolish, but how much more foolish are those who will not give up sin even to save their souls!

When the wicked man turneth away from his wickedness and doeth that which is lawful and right he shall save his soul alive (Ezek. 18:27).

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE

THE "OLD FIELD" SCHOOL

"Learning Lessons" Under the Tutelage of the Old-Time Schoolmaster

MOST of our readers, who are crowned with long years, owe a debt of gratitude to the old-time school which the more excellent institutions of the day emphasize rather than make us forget. The old-time teacher, through whose long suffering patience we were safely initiated into the mysteries of "readin', writin' and 'rithmetic" is surely worth an honorable niche in memory. Furthermore, our marvelous public school system which seeks to make the path of learning sweet, and provides instruction free for every child, is a monument to to the old-time teacher, in whose faithful endeavors and painful experiments (painful sometimes to his pupils, too!), its foundations were laid. Our great men from Washington to Grant got their start in the rugged discipline of "old field" schools—among these Thomas Jefferson, founder of the University of Virginia, and framer of the Declaration of Independence.

The "old field" school was so called from the fact that the humble frame building often stood in an old field all by itself. What a long way we had to trudge to school, and what a hard time we had "getting our lessons!" Problems pricked sharp on every side, birches hung on the walls, dunce-stools stood in the corner, and fountains of tears were in daily play. "The hardest thing—the very hardest thing we had to learn," said a friend to the writer "was A B C. Latin and geometry were as nothing to it when we came to them. The teacher drummed it into us by the sweat of his brow, and we acquired its mastery in anguish unutterable. How many times we were completely routed and overthrown by the letter E. This is the way I learned E. My teacher did not believe in flogging girls. He was a kind-hearted man and hated to flog boys, although he sometimes felt that a hard duty compelled him to it; and he bore a grudge against the letter E because it made so many children unhappy. He had infinite patience with me. I would get on all right until I got to E, when I would simply give it up and cry. At last, just before I got to it, he would call out nervously, 'Skip E!' Presently I was saying, 'This is E—I must skip it:' and there I had the letter lodged in my little head safe and sound. Now babies learn the alphabet sitting on the floor and playing with blocks and picture books. They are familiarized with many useful arts while making cubes, cones and cylinders (instead of mud pies), out of clay in the kindergarten, and while weaving strips of bright-colored paper or cloth into all sorts of pretty things. Why, things are so turned around that last Christmas, little tots were inviting the old folks to the kindergarten to get presents off trees all hung with pretty things of their own contriving."

How hard it used to be to learn to write! One hundred new type-writing machines were recently installed in one of New York's public-schools: and soon that progressive city may have children thinking it fine fun to scribble in shorthand and peg away on type-writers. In schools for the blind, type-writers have been found of much value to sightless little ones, who acquire great speed on them.

When we consider modern helps and contrivances our hearts grow tender thinking of the patient "school-ma'am," or master—the dear old "dominie"—who taught us so much out of blue-back spelling-books and other "dry-as-dust" volumes, with few pictures, and perhaps not even a blackboard to help him. The children who sat on hard benches or rush-bottomed chairs for long hours (from almost sun-up to sun-down, with short intermissions for "big" and "little" recess), looked upon him as a miracle of learning, and the whole country-side regarded his opinion with greater veneration and less questioning than any principal of a modern school can command in these times when we question everything. Children were not under his care for short, graded terms; he carried them from A B C to differential calculus: and often followed them into the cares and responsibilities of later life with his counsels and prayers.

Molly's Language

This is a true story about a horse. A lady was walking in her flower-garden. A fence divided it from the lot where Molly, her son's pretty mare was grazing. Molly kept coming to the fence and hanging her head over. She could not speak English, but plainly Molly wanted to say something. The lady went up to the fence at a point some distance removed from Molly; Molly promptly changed her location, came to the lady, hung her head over her shoulder, and whinnied. "What is it, Molly?" her mistress asked. Molly could only whinny. Plainly, it wasn't food, with grass and to spare in the lot. But Molly was watered from the well, there being no stream in the lot. The lady gave orders for water to be brought, and the way Molly drank it showed that she had been forgotten by the groom and had been trying to tell her mistress of her thirst.

The "Children's Mayor"

This is what Mayor Quincy, of Boston, deserves to be called. He keeps the interests of the children perpetually before the City Council. In 1897 he told the Council that every ward of the city should be provided with some place where outdoor sports and contests could be carried on. To this end several large spaces have been taken for public playgrounds, and two open-air gymnasiums have been provided in thickly populated districts. He recommended also that in public squares and grounds, sand-pits be supplied for small children to play in, with places of shelter for mothers and nurses. At his suggestion the Bath Department put into effect during the last season a plan for providing instruction in swimming for school children, and about 3,500 were taught during the season. And yet the story of what he has done for the children is not half told!

Skating in Holland

Skating is the national sport, and also a medium for business intercourse. Where other countries have streets, roads, fences and hedges, Holland has waterways. You skate away to the next island or farm to call on a neighbor, and the housewife starts off to market with a basket on her arm and the children at her heels. The milk sledge whirls past, drawn by dogs, and full of shining copper jugs. In winter international skating contests take the place of the summer kermis (fair), and Holland, as a rule, comes off with the championship. The merry skating season is now in full swing, and the ice-courses are fairly alive with nobles, burghers and peasants, all engaged in the exhilarating pastime, while the air is jocund with sleigh-bells. "Skates like a true Dutchwoman," say the proud Hollanders of their Queen.

Which is Worse?

A Cape Ann newspaper tells a story like this:

A young woman was rambling along one of our country roads last spring. She was dressed smartly; and, when she met a small, bare-legged urchin carrying a bird's nest with eggs in it, she did not hesitate to stop him. "You are a wicked boy!" she said. "How could you rob that nest? No doubt the poor mother is now grieving for the loss of her eggs." "Oh, maybe she don't care," said the boy, looking solemnly up at the lady's bonnet, "Maybe she's on your hat!"

HOW [illegible]
We feel secure while sheltered thus,
[illegible]
We lift our hearts in praise,
And thank him for the light of home
That brightens all our days.

[illegible]
May find their way within;
Life's pathway is not always free
From darkness, doubt and sin.

Oh, may our structure then be built,
Not on the treach'rous sand,
But on the solid Rock instead
Which will forever stand.

And when the floods of death shall come,
Secure in hopes we'll rest,
And anchor safe beyond the storm
At home, forever blest.

Queens in Domestic Life

IF the character of the world's representative women is any indication, it proves that the standard of woman as home-maker and home-keeper is advancing rather than deteriorating. Take the world's Queens, for instance. Victoria of England's name is a synonym for wife and mother; so is that of ex-Queen Regent Emma, of Holland; and her daughter possesses the virtues which will make her own the same. The lamented Queen of Denmark, mother and mother-in-law to half of Europe, was pre-eminently a home-maker, in spite of the disabilities of a meagre income. The Czarina of Russia, "Sasha," as her husband calls her, is the "White Czar's" sweetheart, wife and counselor in one, and an ideal mother to his little grandduchesses. Queen Margherita, "Pearl of Italy," by right of character deserves her name. Amelie, of Portugal, became a physician in order to give her afflicted husband care that none but a wife would. As wife and mother the unhappy Spanish Queen is irreproachable. The Queen of Norway and Sweden is pious and spotless; one of her sons is a preacher. The recently celebrated fortieth birthday of Germany's Empress emphasized in many ways the high regard in which her husband's subjects hold this lady, an excellent helpmate to their Kaiser, and the wife and mother of seven German girls and boys. The catalogue of her kind acts and little attentions to people of all classes is extensive. As much may be said for every queen mentioned, and for other less conspicuous but equally amiable royal women. As benefactors of the unfortunate and as models of domestic virtues, the lovely "first ladies" of our own land can not be excelled by those of any country.

Compare this standard of royal womanhood with that of previous centuries and, while you stand aghast at the terrible faults imperial purple could cover, you thank Christianity that public opinion, which once permitted kings and queens to be worse than other men and women, now requires that they shall be better. A Napoleon the Great could not to-day so easily divorce a Josephine, in spite of the fact that divorce laws are pitiably lax; and no intellectual power—no power of any kind—could hold a Catherine the Great on any throne, except, perhaps, that of China. The time when wicked men and women could be great kings and queens is forever in the past; and the temper of the times regarding the private life of rulers of men is indicated by the fact that the sentiment of a whole nation is convulsed over the seating of a polygamous Congressman. The standard for kings is not yet so high as that for queens, but as the leaven of Christianity permeates the world more and more, people demand more and more that the domestic life of a ruler shall be above reproach, and that the man who sets an evil example in his home can not be trusted to set a good example in the State.

Children and Bible Stories

An excellent way to interest children in the Bible is to let them tell Bible stories in their own words. Show them on a map the different localities mentioned; tell them about the customs, costume and history of the time: if you have pictures to illustrate, all the better. A few evenings later, call for the story-telling.

Life in an Indian Mogul's Zenana

The Story of Beautiful Doolan Pasha, the "Bride-Princess" of Hyderabad, as Related by a Medical Missionary Inner Life of a Princely Oriental Home Described

THE PALACE OF THE NAWAB, SHOWING THE QUADRANGLE OF BEAUTIFUL BUILDINGS SURROUNDING THE LAKE

DURING a residence of some years in India as a physician, it was my fortune to be called to attend the wives of one of the most liberal and intelligent of the native princes. The Nawab, Sir Keharshed Jah, Ameer Keholeier, Oomarah, etc., etc., etc., of Hyderabad, Deccan, is descended from a noble family, who came to India in the days of the Moguls, and reigned in magnificence at Delhi. The Nawab is a duke, as English titles would run—and when knighted by Queen Victoria a few years ago, he received the honor gracefully; but that title is a mere trifle compared to his inherited rank. He was also connected with the family of the old Nizam, or King of Hyderabad, who was the ruler during mutiny times.

The Prime Minister, Sir Salar Jung, and the aged Nizam were wise enough to foresee that eventually the English would conquer India. At this juncture, when assistance from the native princes was invaluable, the Nizam and Sir Salar Jung offered to the English their standing armies to fight the mutineers. This aid was no doubt valuable in stopping the horrible bloodshed. This great service the English government has always fully recognized. The native State of Hyderabad is allowed to remain as in olden times. Its princes are the possessors of ancient titles, and of fabulous revenues from landed estates, villages and towns, extending over the richest part of Central India.

Many Mohammedan princes have a multiplicity of wives, and the Nizam has about 300. He had, however, no direct heir. For many years, every little manchild either died at birth or soon after. During this period, a beautiful daughter was born to the Nizam. In Mohammedan courts, it is considered a shame for a girl to be seen by any except her immediate male relatives. This beautiful little princess was a noted exception. The hearts of the father and his lovely child were knit together as one. She was his constant companion in the zenana, even following him to the palace, where she sometimes gained a passing glimpse of the outer world. This unprecedented fondness of a father for a daughter, the Nizam most pathetically apologized for, by saying: "She is not my daughter. She is my son!"

The palace, where the princess sometimes followed her indulgent father, extends around four sides of an artificial lake, which is fed by an aqueduct in a distant elevated suburb of the city. Women coolies water the garden many times a day. None but princes, or very rich people, can afford gardens in that very hot country. The sight of a well-watered garden during the long dry season, is the token of great luxury.

THE NAWAB, SIR KEHARSHED JAH, IN MOGUL COSTUME

As time passed, and the little princess grew up to womanhood, with reluctant heart the father arranged a marriage for her.

Doolan Pasha, the "Bride-Princess," as she was called, was to be united to the Nawab, Sir Keharshed Jah, as his rightful wife. Keharshed Jah ("the glory of the moon and stars"), was a happy bridegroom. And a beautiful palace was built for the princess, and then the strict zenana life encircled her. But such a free spirit could not be prisoned within stone walls. Very touching stories are told of her. To-day in the ancient walled city, one still hears the tales of the beautiful life of "Doolan Pasha," who seems so like a Christian that we feel sure God gave her freely of his own Spirit. Having a revenue becoming her rank, instead of lavishing it upon herself, or her surroundings, it was her pleasure to send her attendants to search out the poor and sick and wretched. In every neglected part of that intensely Indian and Mohammedan city — into the hidden nooks and dark places—her sympathy and love found those who never could see her—or could even kiss her hands or feet. Their need was to her a claim on her generosity, and when the news came from her zenana that her sweet life had gone out, the city was startled with cries, and wild confusion, as those who had so often been blessed by her rent their clothes, beat their breasts, and threw dust and ashes in the air. They mourned with a great and very sore lamentation.

This photograph of the interior of the princess' zenana was taken for me by a lady photographist, and gives an idea of the dwellings of those shut-away lives. Her son is now the heir of His Excellency, the Nawab, Sir Keharshed Jah, and bears in his face tokens of nobility. At the time of the recent jubilee of Queen Victoria, this prince was sent by the Nizam to represent the native State of Hyderabad at the festivities. The Queen entertained him, with his Aide de Camp, at Windsor Palace. The photograph of the young Nawab was taken by the Queen's own photographist, and was presented to me at the time of his return to India.

The young Nawab, as well as his father, is a great traveler in his own country, often taking two or more of the zenanas to the mountain resorts and the great cities. It has been my good fortune to accompany them on more than one of those journeys. To keep strict zenana is a most expensive and difficult undertaking. To accommodate the zenana, a side-track is laid from the main railway into a large zenana garden. There, cars with closed shutters are run into the garden. In the darkness of night, in closed carriages and covered palanquins, come the ladies and their slave attendants, from the separate zenanas, thus enabling them to enter the cars in strict seclusion. The next morning these cars are attached to the train. In this way extensive journeys can be made and the otherwise tedious zenana life is varied. This prince has made many such journeys, thus giving his wives pleasures which less fortunate Mohammedan women can never enjoy.

The annual income of the prince in question is equal to over $2,000,000. He, being a strict Mohammedan, does not put it out on bond and mortgage, and thus receive interest for its use. This the Koran calls usury, and is forbidden. Therefore he deposits it, as fast as received, in vaults where it lies until required, the silver often turning quite black with oxide, before it reaches the outer world again. These vaults are built under his own business palace, and are guarded by soldiers day and night. It is a very gay and martial sight to see this prince, when he goes to drive, guarded on every side by mounted cavalry. With gay banners, and flashing spears and bayonets, the horsemen guard the carriage of the prince. His household numbers about 2,000 souls, and he employs a medical staff of six or seven doctors, and a well qualified nurse.

Whenever any members of the royal family from England visit India, this prince entertains them in his palaces, which are luxuriously equipped, with the idea of making his guests comfortable as to every detail of hospitality. In order to perform such state and social duties in the best form, a cultured English gentleman is in constant attendance; one of the latest, in such a capacity, being a nephew of Lord Littleton. By such care and counsel, very extensive social entertainments are given.

State dinners are often given, as many as 400 guests being seated at once at various tables under spreading palms, in the midst of tropical flowers. The whole scene is made to resemble a fairy garden, with electric lights hidden in drooping vines and gay hangings. It seems strange that at such entertainments one never sees a native lady, although many English ladies may be present. We shall hope for better days in the future, when these beautiful Indian women shall take their proper place as the companions and the equals of their husbands and natural guardians.

ALICE BYRAM CONDICT, M.D.,

Formerly in the service of His Excellency the Nawab, Sir Keharshed Jah.

After a few years of service here in America, Dr. Alice B. Condict, who gives us the above, is about to return to her former field of work in Bombay. This time, in addition to medical work among the women in the vicinity of that great city of India, Dr. Condict is preparing to open a Rest House for Christian workers and missionaries.

Bombay is central, has an equable climate, varying from 75° F. to 95° F., and this is a boon to many, who for many months in the interior live in a temperature of from 90° to 105°. The lives of missionaries, and especially native Christian workers, are most exhausting. Those who have never known such environment can have no conception of the depressing influences surrounding the devoted men and women who work in village and jungle districts.

The poor of India are distressingly poor; so that in many extensive districts real coin (even copper), is seldom handled; for such poor people, a small shell called cowrie, is the coin. Our missionaries are busy going to these very neglected ones. "To them the Gospel is preached." When one of these Gospel messengers is over weary, perchance ill, or requires a change, or medical care, there is no alternative—he must go to hospitals where decided heathen influences prevail. Dr. Condict is about to open this Rest House to meet this great need of the faithful workers for Jesus. She will arrive in Bombay about the middle of February. Fifty dollars will furnish a room in the Rest House and $100 will endow a bed for one year, so that many can have the comforts of a Christian house. Those of our readers who may desire to aid the work of Dr. Condict, may write to her at Bombay, India, where she will personally answer all such communications.

AFTER-SUPPER CHATS

The Doing of Little Kindnesses — Shopping Reflections — Health and Cheerfulness, Etc.

She doeth little kindnesses
Which most leave undone, or despise.

THESE familiar lines have been in my mind often during the mid-winter days through which we are passing. We were sitting at dinner in my home one evening lately—the city dinner hour, you know, is about seven o'clock, long after dark, at this season—and the night was cold and blustering, one of the bitterest we have had, with the north winds sending forth the signals of a coming storm. There came a timid ring at the door, and presently the pretty maid, her rosy face quite sad, announced an unexpected guest. "If you should set your eyes on him, mum, the weest specimen of a lad, an' he's just starved with the cold, and not a shoe to his foot, nor a bit of an overcoat on, this dreadful night!" We do have people calling at the door for alms, and I sometimes fancy, from the partiality of tramps for my house, that the fraternity have set their secret mark somewhere on the doorstep, but there was evidently an unusual distinction of sorrow about this child.

"In the holiday season, too!" exclaimed the young lady of the family. "What a shame. Bring him right in, Bridget, and let me look into the case."

WHEN our imperative daughter-of-the-house takes this tone, there is nothing more to be said. The child was speedily warmed and fed, and clothed even to new shoes, while my timid protest about the charity organization was overruled, though we did take his name and number and family history, and Mildred went to see him the next day, and found everything true as truth, and sad as poverty and sickness and no work for father and mother could make it. And this leads me to the somewhat trite remark that we cannot in winter have ourselves always too straitly bound by rigid rules. We must often, for our own good, as well as for his, relieve the individual, without waiting for the organized society which may later come in with its more lasting efficiency of help.

I saw this same Mildred do a very lovely thing on Christmas Day. A messenger boy brought a package to her door. "Lady," he said, "this box fell out of my hand, and I'm afraid whatever is in it is broken. If I can pay for it I will." The box was opened, and there, in fragments, lay what had been a beautiful piece of china. Mildred loves china, and the color came to her face as she saw the wreck of her Christmas gift. But she laid her little white hand on the boy's shoulder, and said, without a moment's hesitation:

"Don't think any more about it. This is something you cannot pay for. Accidents will happen, and you did not mean to break it."

Which, take it all in all, was an act and speech of sweet unselfish charity, worthy of the day and season.

I WAS shopping in New York the other day, and the salesman whom I have dealt with for years said to me, "Did you see the lady who went out just as you came in? She is Miss——," and he named her with a sort of awe. "One day last winter she was at my counter, and she had a very rare and elegant book in her hand. She saw me looking at it, and said: 'If you would like to have the reading of this, I will lend it to you when I have finished it.' And not long after I was laid up with an illness, and not able to get to the store for several weeks. One day the expressman called and left me the book. The lady had found out where I lived and remembered to send it to me."

This, too, was another act of unselfish kindness and love. As we go on in life it more and more seems to me that the only thing really worth while is to make people happy. If we can, in any small way, diminish the sum of wretchedness in other lives, let us by all means try to do so, not thinking of ourselves, and patterning by Christ, who went about doing good.

YOUR depression, dear Mrs. R. V., is very easily accounted for by your state of health. Indigestion is a foe to cheerfulness, and when one suffers torment unspeakable after every mouthful of food and drink of water, one can hardly be gay. I know nothing personally of this messenger of Apollyon, but I have seen enough of his assaults on my friends to make me aware of his baneful power. From what you tell me, I fancy you are living too sedentary a life, and I am sure you need fresh air and outdoor exercise. Try walking an hour every morning, and, if possible, procure some sensible apparatus for enlarging the chest and developing the muscles, and use it regularly. Let your food be simple, and for awhile avoid hot bread and fried things. Eat very slowly, and say to yourself and everybody else, "With God's help, I am going to get well." "Rejoice not over me, my enemy," said the prophet. "Though I fall, I shall arise again."

CHEERFULNESS is of course largely a matter of temperament, and some people with every apparent reason for depression, manage to preserve their gayety. It is also, dear friend, a matter of faith. I once knew a man, poor and dependent, totally blind and almost as deaf as a post, but nothing obscured his sunshine. "I have a rich Father in heaven," he used to say, "and why should I be cast down?" Thank God for the brightness in your way. Refuse to be gloomy. Cultivate the society of young people. Be much with the children. And daily carry your burden to the dear Lord and leave it with him.

PHYSICIANS with us always administer an anesthetic in cases such as you describe, dear Southern matron, unless there is some reason known to them why the patient should not take one. Sometimes there is occasion, particularly after the birth of a babe, to dread the subsequent effects of ether or chloroform on the mother. The doctors know best in all cases. If one calls in her family attendant, she should trust unreservedly to his skill and judgment. But there is no sacredness in pain, per se, and modern science does all it can to render pain inoperative. Fortitude and courage are praiseworthy qualities, yet common sense and religion both show us that strength in the long run is preserved best by those who suffer least physical agony. We start in life with a certain amount of capital, in the way of strength and health, and we may increase this by good management, or use it up recklessly, as spendthrifts do their patrimony. Blessed among men are those members of the medical profession who lessen the sum of human suffering.

A HOUSE-WARMING? How perfectly delightful! I am so glad that some of my younger friends are engaged in nest-building and home-planning. When a new home is ready for occupancy, the house-warming is simply the first gathering of kindred and acquaintance under its roof. The invitations to such an affair should be very informal, given verbally, or in letters of a simple straightforward character, like this, for example:

CLOVER CROFT, N. Y.

Dear Mrs. [illegible]

Will you and your husband give John and me the pleasure of your company on Thursday evening next, from eight till eleven o'clock? We are just established in our new home, and would like our friends to enjoy it with us.

Sincerely yours,

Jan. —, 1899. MARY VIOLET FOSTER.

You need not follow this form precisely, but a note of this general style will answer the purpose. For the entertainment of guests on such an occasion, provide a simple supper of oysters, sandwiches and coffee, or, if you prefer, and [illegible] Welsh rarebit. Cake and coffee will, however, meet every need of such a function. Conversation, games, music and recitations are sufficient in the way of a programme. Above everything, give your friends a very cordial welcome.

TO MY troubled lassie, I can but recommend great patience, and, will she and every other young woman who has parents, pardon me if I add a hint about the fifth commandment. Surely, when God bids us each "honor thy father and thy mother," he means us to be tender over their caprices and foibles, gentle in view of their limitations, and lovingly anxious to hide their frailties from the world.

"A BEAUTIFUL POSSIBILITY"

A New and Charming Serial Story, Written Exclusively for "The Christian Herald"

BY EDITH FERGUSON BLACK

SUMMARY OF THE STORY

In Barbadoes, Lenox Hildreth a New England gentleman of learning, culture and wealth, was living with his only daughter, Evadne, a beautiful girl, who, at the opening of the story is sixteen years of age. Mr. Hildreth, though charitable and kind, was an infidel, but in his later years turned in faith and love to Christ. He intended telling his daughter of the change, but a sudden seizure of illness found him with the disclosure not made. With his dying breath he enjoined her to make it the business of her life to seek Christ. The girl, whom he had reared a pagan, could not understand his injunction. After his death, she removes to the home of her uncle, Judge Hildreth, at Marlborough, in New England, to whom, as his only brother, Lenox Hildreth confided her and her large fortune. She is anxious above all things to obey her father's injunction, but her uncle, aunt and cousins, though professing Christians, cannot help her to find Christ. From Pompey, her uncle's colored coachman and his wife Dyce, Evadne gains the best practical idea of what finding Christ means. On a farm in the neighborhood of Marlborough, John Randolph, a young man, who has lost parents and property, has become a farm-hand in the employ of Mr. Hawthorne. In his work and in his relations with his employer's family he is trying to shape his life on the principles of Christ's teaching.

CHAPTER IX

In the valley of the shadow

LOVE of fresh air and of pure out-of-doors life, always strong in Evadne's nature, seemed to increase as her indoor life became more and more uncongenial. Her father had enjoined her to seek Christ, without telling her how she might find him; but had committed her to the care of these relatives who, by their church connection, made a profession of knowing him. Yet they evidently were not able to tell her how to find him, and they reproved and snubbed her when, in her ignorance, she tried to get direction. It seemed to Evadne that she was always under the displeasure of her aunt and cousins, and she was glad to escape from their companionship into the wooded country around Marlborough, where she could be alone.

But she had forgotten how different the climate was from that of her native island, and how sudden and severe were the changes that characterized it. One heavy cold followed upon another, until one night she lay tossing through the weary hours, only half conscious, with her mind full of strange fancies.

"Evadne will not be down," announced Marion the next morning, as she entered the breakfast room; "she can't lift her head from the pillow. Celestine thinks she is sickening for a fever."

"Dear me, how tiresome!" exclaimed Mrs. Hildreth, "I have such a horror of sickness in the house—one never knows where it will end. Ring the bell for Sarah, Marion, to take up her breakfast."

"It is no use, mamma. She says she does not want anything."

But that is nonsense. The child must eat. Dear! dear! if it is fever, she will need a nurse, and nurses always make such an upheaval in a house."

"You had better go up, my dear, and see for yourself," said Judge Hildreth, "Celestine may be mistaken."

"Mercy!" cried Isabelle, "it is to be hoped she is! I have the most abject dread of fever, and that is enough to make me catch it. Fancy having one's head shorn like a convict! The very idea is appalling."

"Oh, of course if there is the slightest danger, you and Marion will have to go to Madame Castle's to board," said her mother; "it is very provoking that Evadne should have chosen to be sick just now."

"Not likely the poor girl had much choice in the matter," suggested Louis; "there are a few things, lady mother, over which the best of us have no control."

"I wish you would go up and see the child, Kate," said Judge Hildreth, impatiently. "If there is the least fear of anything serious I will send the carriage at once for Dr. Russe. It is a risky business transplanting tropical flowers into our cold climate."

Celestine, the kind-hearted French maid, was bending over Evadne's pillow when Mrs. Hildreth entered the room. She had grown to love the quiet stranger whose gentle courtesy made her work seem light, and it was with genuine regret that she turned towards her mistress and whispered: "It is the feevar. I know it well. My seestar had it and died."

Evadne's eyes were closed and she took no notice of her aunt's entrance. Mrs. Hildreth spoke to her and then left the room hurriedly to summon her husband. Even her unpracticed eyes showed her her niece was very ill.

Dr. Russe came, examined her and shook his head gravely.

"It is a serious case," he said; "you must have a nurse, and I do not know where you will find one. I never remember a spring when there was so much sickness in the city. I sent my last nurse to a patient yesterday, and since then have had two applications for one. It is most unfortunate. The young lady will need constant care; she requires a person of experience."

Pompey, waiting to drive the doctor home, caught the words the doctor spoke as he descended the steps to enter the carriage, and came forward eagerly.

"If you please, Missus," he said, touching his hat, "Dyce would come. She's had a powerful sight of exper'ence nussin' fevers in New Orleans. She'd be proper glad to tend Miss Vadney."

"How is that?" questioned the busy doctor. "Oh, your wife, my good fellow? The very thing. Let her come at once."

So Dyce came, and into her sympathetic ears were poured the delirious ravings of the lonely heart, which had been so suddenly torn from its genial surroundings of love and happiness and thrust into the chilling atmosphere of misunderstanding and neglect.

Every day the patient grew weaker, and after each visit the doctor looked graver. Mrs. Hildreth began to feel the gnawings of remorse as she thought of the lonely girl to whom she had so coldly refused a daughter's place, and the Judge's thoughts grew unbearable as he remembered his broken trust. Even Louis missed the earnest face which he had grown to watch with a curious sense of pleasure, while the girls at school felt their hearts sink as they thought of the young cousin so soon to pass through the valley of the shadow.

But Evadne did not die. The fever spent itself at last, and then followed long days of utter prostration both of mind and body. Dyce's cheery patience never failed. Her sunny nature diffused a bright hopefulness throughout the sick chamber, until Evadne would lie in a dreamy content, almost fancying herself back in the old home, as she listened to the musical tones and watched the dusky hands which so deftly ministered to her comfort. During the greater part of her time of convalescence, Evadne lay silent. Not even to Dyce could she speak, save in short subdued whispers. Tender, encouraging words Dyce would utter in her quiet, soothing tones, and then relapse into the silence that her patient seemed to enjoy. But such words as Dyce did speak were instinct with spiritual life. Christ was ever present to the simple, sincere soul, and her constant prayer was that Evadne might realize his presence, too.

"Honey," she said, as she bent over the poor thin face, "de deah Lord loves you. I know he does."

Evadne heard and her eyes filled. Dyce could not have told her anything more welcome. One day, after she had lain for a long time in silence, she looked up at her faithful nurse, and the gray eyes shone like stars.

"Dyce," she cried softly, "I have found Jesus Christ."

CHAPTER X

A Spoiled Life

Dr. Russe had at the same time another patient whom we know.

Reginald Hawthorne lay upon a couch which had been placed among the cool shadows on the wide veranda of his lovely home. The birds held high carnival around him, nestling in the large cherry tree, playing hide and seek among the fragrant apple blossoms, and making the air melodious with their merry songs. Brilliant orioles flashed to and fro like gleams of gold in the sunlight, as they built their airy hammocks high among the swaying branches of the great willow, and one inquisitive robin swept boldly through the clustering vines which screened the front of the veranda, and perched upon his shoulder. He heard the merry hum of the bees at work and the strident call of the locust, mingled with the distant neighing of horses and the soft lowing of the cows, but all the sweetness of nature was powerless to lift the gloom which seemed to envelop him as in a shroud. His face was white and drawn with pain, and there were heavy purple rings beneath his eyes. Reginald Hawthorne would be a cripple for life.

The College Football Club had met a New York team in the yearly contest, which was looked forward to as one of the events in the athletic world, and Reginald had been foremost among the leaders of the play. Fierce and long had been the fight, and the enthusiastic spectators had shouted themselves hoarse with applause, or groaned with despair when the honor of Marlborough seemed likely to be lost. Then had come a mighty onward rush, and the opposing forces concentrated into one seething mass of struggling humanity. When they drew apart at last, the College boys had made the welkin ring with shouts of victory, but their bravest champion lay white and still upon the field.

Long days and nights of pain had followed, when John and Mrs. Hawthorne were at their wit's end to alleviate the sufferings of the unfortunate boy. Now the pain had resolved itself into a dull aching, but Reginald would never again walk without a crutch.

The mortification to his father was extreme. A passionate man, he had centred all his hopes upon his son, whose position in society he fondly expected to repay him for his years of unremitting toil, and this was the end of it all! He grew daily more overbearing and hard to please, and his ebullitions of disappointment and rage were terrible to witness. He vented his anger most frequently upon John, the sight of whose superb strength goaded the unhappy man into a frenzy, and John's forbearance was tried to the utmost: but there was a sweet patience growing in his soul which made it possible to endure in silence, however capricious or unreasonable the commands of his master might be, and Reginald, watching him critically, marveled at the mysterious inner strength of his friend.

He came along now, with his quick, light step, and drew a chair up beside Reginald's couch. He planned his work so as to be with the invalid as much as possible, and his constant sympathy and cheer were all that made the days bearable to him.

"Well Rege, how goes it?" he asked in tones as tender as a woman's.

Reginald looked up at him with envious eyes. There was such a freshness about this strong young life, as if every moment were a separate joy.

"I wish I was dead!" he answered moodily.

"Don't dare to wish that!" said John

How do you know those baking powders are made from alum?

Their lower price, their unfamiliar names, generally betray them.

But it is not necessary for you to know. You know that Royal does not contain alum, that it makes the best food, that it is pure and healthful. This knowledge is sufficient to enable you to protect yourself and your family from alum baking powders and the evil results which are certain to follow their use.

A BEAUTIFUL POSSIBILITY

quickly, "until you have made the most of your life."

"The most of my life!" echoed Reginald contemptuously. "That's well put John, I must say! What is my life worth to me now? You see what my father thinks of it. A useless log, no more valuable than a piece of waste paper. I believe it would have pleased him better if I had been killed outright. He wouldn't have had the humiliation of it always before his eyes. If it had been any sort of a decent accident, I believe I could bear it better, but to be knocked over in a football match, like the duffer that I am—Bah!"

The concentrated bitterness of the last words made John's heart ache.

"Looking backward, Rege," he said quietly, "will never make a man of you. It is only a waste of time and vital tissue. But there are lots of noble lives in spite of limitations. Paul had his thorn in the flesh you know, and Milton his blindness. Difficulties are a spur to the best that is in us."

"Difficulties, John. You never look at them, do you?"

John laughed. "It is not worth while, except to see how to surmount them."

"I wish you could be idle just for an hour," said Reginald peevishly. "You make me nervous."

John took another stitch in the halter he was mending. "Old Father Time's spoiling tooth is never still, Rege. I have to work to keep pace with it."

"I should think you would need a month of loafing to make up for the sleep you have lost. You're ahead of Napoleon, John, for he only kept one eye open, but I've never been able to catch you napping once. How have you stood it, man?"

"Forty winks is a fair allowance sometimes, Rege."

"I declare, John, I can't fathom you," and Reginald moved impatiently upon his couch. "You are invulnerable as Achilles. I never saw a fellow get so much comfort out of everything as you do, and yet your life is a steady grind. What does it all mean?"

"It means," said John softly, "that I am a Christ's man, and he has lifted me above the power of circumstances. Jesus is centre and circumference with me now, Rege. You were talking yesterday about some man wanting the earth. I own the earth, because it belongs to my Father—the best part of it you know. There is a truer giving than by title deeds to material acres, and the world has grown very beautiful since my Father made me heir of all things through his Son. The birds' songs have a new note in them, and the sunlight is brighter, and there is a different blue in the sky. I'm monarch of all I survey because I get the good out of everything, mere earthly possession doesn't amount to much—a man has to leave the finest estates behind him—but I get the concentrated sweetness of it all wherever I am. It is God's world you know, and he is my Father."

John was called away just then to attend to some gentlemen who had come to look at the horses, and Reginald waited for his return in vain. He heard his father's voice once raised high in stormy wrath, then all was still again. Some time afterward through the leafy curtain of the veranda he saw Mr. Hawthorne drive past with a face so distorted with passion that he shivered.

"There's been no end of a row this time," he soliloquized. "It is a mystery to me why John puts up with it. He's free to go when he chooses. I'm sure I'd clear out if I wasn't such a good for nothing. The Governor is getting to be more like a bear than a human being. It's a dog's life for everybody unlucky enough to be under the same roof with him."

Reginald was right about there having been a row. It had been the worst of many lately, and it was destined to be the last in which John Randolph was to suffer.

Down at the bend of the river a tall figure lay stretched upon the moss. The river laughed and the birds sang, but John Randolph's face was buried in his arms.

To leave Hollywood—that very night! The place whose very stones were dear to him—where he had learned all he knew of home. To be turned off like a beggar without a moment's warning, after all his years of toil! To say good-bye forever to the human friends who loved him, and the dear dumb friends whom he had fondled and tended with such constant care. Never again to swing along through the sweet freshness of the morning, before the sun was up, to find the earliest snowdrops for Mrs Hawthorne, or to take a spin in the moonlight with every nerve atingle across the frozen bosom of the lake, or wander in delight along the wood roads when every tree was clad in the witching beauty of a silver thaw, or sweep across the wide stretching country in the very poetry of motion; or hear the soft swish of the tall grass as it fell in fragrant rows before the mower, or the creak of the vans as they bore its ripened sweetness toward the great barns, while bird and bee and locust joined in the harmony of the harvest home, until the sun sank to rest amidst cloud draperies of royal purple and crimson and gold, and the sweet voiced twilight soothed the world into peace.

On and on the hours swept while John fought his battle. At length he rose, and with long lingering glances of good-bye to every tree, and rock, and flower, began his homeward way. He would think of it so while he could. In a few short hours he would be a wanderer upon the face of the earth. A sudden joy crept into the weary eyes. So was Jesus Christ!

Too Generous

A colored preacher once (Mr. Moody relates) said many of his congregation would be lost because they were too generous. He saw that the people looked surprised; so he said:

"Perhaps you think I have made a mistake, and that I ought to have said you will be lost because you are not generous enough. That is not so; I meant just what I said. You give away too many sermons. You hear them, as it were, for other people."

There are a good many who listen for those behind them; they say the message is very good for neighbor So-and so; and they pass it over their shoulders, till it gets clear out of the door.

HEROIC CHAPLAINS.... ....IN THE LATE WAR

Servants of Christ who Risked their Lives by Land and Sea for the Love of Souls

BY CHAPLAIN C. C BATEMAN, U. S. A.

THE hearty sympathy and invaluable support accorded to chaplains in general by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, through many years, prompts me to some observations regarding the chaplains who were before Santiago during the short, but memorable, campaign against the Spanish in the summer of 1898.

At the head of the chaplain's corps of the regular army, stands the Rev. George

CHAPLAIN C. C. BATEMAN, U. S. A.

Robinson, D.D., of Fort Leavenworth, whose long and useful career has been crowned and enriched by a most acceptable service on board the hospital ship, Relief, in Cuban and Porto Rican waters, and en route to American seaports with sick and wounded.

Chaplain Henry Swift, of Fort Russell, who served with the Thirteenth (13th) U. S. Infantry, distinguished himself, not only by abundant labors, but also by his heroic fearlessness under many trying circumstances. He spared himself neither night nor day, and when the fighting was all over, he asked his brigade commander to relieve him from further regimental duty, in order that he might devote himself exclusively to the care of patients in the yellow fever camps. This extraordinary request was of course granted, but the brave chaplain soon fell a victim to the yellow scourge himself. He, however, sufficiently recovered from the effects of the disease to return with the army to the United States and subsequently performed duty at Montauk in camp and hospital.

Rev. Henry A. Brown, now in the regular army, won lasting friendships and admiration by his self-sacrificing service with the Rough Riders under Colonels Wood and Roosevelt. He was so thoroughly practical in so many different directions, that the general opinion was expressed by a soldier who said: "Brown is all right wherever you put him." The action of President McKinley in appointing Mr. Brown to a permanent chaplaincy has been widely approved.

Rev. George R. Vandewater, D.D., rector of St. Andrew's Protestant Episcopal Church, of New York, performed well a chaplain's part with the Seventy-first New York Infantry Regiment. His hearty, generous, and at times amusing adjustments to the fortunes or misfortunes of war were worthy of emulation.

"Well, I never supposed," said he to me on one occasion, "that I could lapse so easily into primitive savagery. But really I am becoming accustomed to mud and dirt and stench; still I do hope I shall not grow to like such things. I have learned to preach under all kinds of conditions, and to administer the communion on top of a hard-tack box."

I fancy Dr. Vandewater returned to his parish with an experience which will afford him a fund of happy illustrations and reminiscences through life. These, told in his graphic witty style, would, I dare say, be worth hearing.

Chaplain Chas. S. Walkley, now of Fort Monroe, Va., served with the Second U. S. Infantry, and endeared himself to officers and men alike, by his painstaking devotion and untiring zeal to every interest calculated to minister to the material or moral well-being of the regiment he accompanied. It may be said of him in every truth, that his many friends not only appreciate him, but love him. He went down for a time, under the hard service in the field and was very ill, but returned to duty again "with a heart for any fate." During his illness, he lost nearly all his personal effects and clothing—one of the attendant misfortunes of getting sick in the field.

In caring for the sick, in ministering to the wounded or dying, in burials of the dead, in writing those painful letters to relatives, on the death of loved ones, in assisting the surgeons, in distributing the mails, not to mention the response to many other demands not easily classified, the chaplains before Santiago had their hands and hearts very full indeed. The strain upon the nervous forces was so great that I believe everyone of them was more or less prostrated by it, and from the effects of it some may never recover.

The transports homeward-bound, from Cuba were often full of sick, and the burials at sea were shocking ceremonies to debilitated men. I was surprised to hear a soldier remark that, to him, the thought of being cast into the sea, when dead, was a nightmare from which he could not escape, and on this account alone, his release from the ship would be the happiest moment of his life. He had never seen the ocean until he went to Cuba.

But through the never-to-be-forgotten days in Chickamauga, Tampa, Siboney, Santiago and Montauk, the Christian Commission, and THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, under God, kept up our courage and cheered us on.

A GOOD PRACTICE.

If You Want a Good Appetite and Perfect Digestion.

After each meal dissolve one or two of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets in the mouth and, mingling with the food, they constitute a perfect digestive, absolutely safe for the most sensitive stomach.

They digest the food before it has time to ferment, thus preventing the formation of gas and keeping the blood pure and free from the poisonous products of fermented, half-digested food.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets make the complexion clear by keeping the blood pure.

They increase flesh by digesting flesh-forming foods.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets is the only remedy designed especially for the cure of stomach troubles and nothing else.

One disease, one remedy, the successful physician of today is the specialist, the successful medicine is the medicine prepared especially for one disease.

A whole package taken at one time would not hurt you, but would simply be a waste of good material.

Over six thousand men and women in the state of Michigan alone have been cured of indigestion and dyspepsia by the use of Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets.

Sold by all druggists at 50 cents per package.

Eucalol Cures Catarrh

Sir Morell Mackenzie

Dry Catarrh, Nasal and Post-Nasal Catarrh, Ozena, Catarrhal Headache, Catarrhal Deafness and Acute Cold in the Head.

Sir Morell Mackenzie

the most noted Throat and Nose Specialist the world has yet seen, says:

"Moisture of the mucous membrane of the nose is as essential to the sense of smell as that of the tongue is to taste. The influence of the seventh pair of nerves in indirectly causing dryness has already been pointed out, and it is only necessary here to call attention to the arrest of secretion in the first stages of nasal catarrh, which often gives rise to temporary anosmia (loss of smell.

"SIR MORELL MACKENZIE."

In health the mucous membrane is always moist, and this moisture readily carries away any foreign substances finding lodgment in the nasal passage or cavity. In disease the excessive flow of mucus is Nature's effort to relieve the congested membrane, but germs find lodgment, and these must be destroyed. Drying the mucous passage only gives them better places to lodge, breed, and multiply.

Dry medicated air, "dry air," or smoke "vapor fumes" cannot cure catarrh. They appear to give relief [burning a little camphor and inhaling the fumes will give the same relief], but aggravate the disease. They interfere with Nature's efforts in her own behalf.

The only rational treatment is an antiseptic soothing wash applied to the diseased parts, removing the accumulated mucus, destroying the germs, and the application of the antiseptic Eucalol Cream, healing the irritated mucous membrane, leaving no lodgment for catarrhal germs.

Eucalol Treatment is Free

In order to prove the curative power of Eucalol and our confidence in it, we will gladly send to any reputable person a complete outfit, with full directions, for two weeks' trial. If at the end of that time it has not benefited you, return it and no charge will be made. If you find it helpful, send us 75 cents by mail or express money order.

We are anxious for everyone subject to catarrh and colds in the head to try the Eucalol Treatment. Send us your name and address on a postal card, and we will send the complete treatment at once. You are under no obligations to pay. There are no strings to our offer. Our remedy is our best advertisement.

IDLE IN THE MARKET-PLACE

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Feb. 5. Matt. 20: 1-16

IDLENESS is put by Christ in this parable in the light of an unnatural condition, which ought not to exist unless there is some cogent reason for it. A man who is doing nothing should be able to give some satisfactory reason for his idleness. "Why stand ye here all the day, idle?" Is it possible that in the day of final account, there will be some from whom the Lord will have occasion to demand such a reason? With so many poor and sick and suffering all around us; with so many people within our reach who do not know what Christianity really is, who do not know what Christ can be to those who trust him and love him, there is abundant occupation for the Christian. Work is waiting that needs to be done and done quickly. Much of it, too, must be done by the layman. Howsoever devoted and earnest ministers are, there are some people that they cannot reach, and many whom they cannot reach so effectively as the ordinary non-clerical worker. Opportunities for service of one kind or another come to every one, burdens that may be lifted from weary shoulders, sorrowing souls hungering for words of comfort, weak and wounded strugglers in life's battle needing encouragement. Christ sees it all and he asks of his people, "Why stand ye here all the day, idle?"

The parable was also intended to teach another lesson beside that of activity. That lesson relates to the motive of work. Peter had asked (Matt. 19: 27): "What shall we have?" To a Being whose life was so completely one of self-sacrifice, such a question must have been very repugnant. It showed the spirit of the hireling whose chief concern is about his wages. So Christ administered the delicate reproof contained in the parable. The men first hired had made a bargain. They were to have a penny a day, the ordinary pay in those times of an unskilled laborer. Those who were hired later, made no stipulation. They trusted their employer. When the time of payment came, the lord was just to the first, but he was generous to the others. That is the chief lesson of the parable, and it is useless to inquire who are represented by the different relays of laborers or the other accesories of the story. It was the right spirit of service that our Lord was inculcating. He wanted no hirelings in his service. Those who enlisted under his banner for the sake of the reward, would not be disappointed, but they would see others who had entered it for love and who had toiled without thought of compensation, trusting their Master, preferred before them. It is not length of service, nor high and conspicuous position that counts in the day of final award, but the spirit in which the service was rendered. In that other description Christ gave of that day (Matt. 25: 37), those who were rewarded had thought so little of reward that they had forgotten having rendered a service at all. That is the spirit Christ desires to see in his people. He wants his servants to work for love of him and not for what they will get. Those who do so will not miss a reward.

Every employer recognizes the same principle of service. He knows that the man who drops his tools the moment the clock strikes, and will not do a stroke of work unless he is assured of its being paid for, is not so valuable to him as he who takes an interest in the business and feels a pride in his work. No artist would have any confidence in the success of a pupil whose one thought was the price he would get for his pictures. To succeed, he must love art so much that he would paint, though his pictures were never sold. Christ's treatment of the woman who broke the alabaster box of ointment and anointed his feet, and his praise of the widow who cast two mites into the treasury, indicate the same appreciation of motive. He loves the spontaneous outburst of affection, the implicit unquestioning trust in himself in contrast with the bargain-making servant who wants to know what he is to receive for his service. Many of the first will be last, not because they were first in the work, but because they were self-seekers.

PILATE'S EXCUSE *

"OF what dost thou wish to speak, O Pilate?" asked Cinna.

"Ye can have a spectacle to-day," answered the procurator. "In Jerusalem, ye should be amused with something; above all, Antea should be in the midst of crowds at midday. Three men will die on the cross to-day; that is better than nothing! Because of the Pasch a mob of the strangest ruffians has come from out all this land to the city. Ye can look at those people. I will command to give you a place apart near the crosses. I hope that the condemned will die bravely. One of them is a marvelous person: he calls himself the Son of God; he is as mild as a dove, and has really done nothing to merit death."

"And didst thou condemn him to the cross?"

"I wanted to rid myself of trouble, and also avoid stirring up that nest of hornets that buzz around the temple; even as it is they send complaints to Rome against me. Besides, the accused is not a Roman citizen."

"The man will not suffer less for that reason."

The procurator made no answer, but after a while he began to speak, as if to himself,—

"There is one thing that I do not like,—exaggeration. Whoever uses that word before me takes away my cheerfulness for the day. The golden mean! that is what wisdom commands us to follow, as I think. I might leave my subject a second time. Go to witness the crucifixion. I am convinced that the Nazarene will die valiantly. I gave command to flog him, thinking in that way to save him from death. I am not cruel. When he was lashed he was as patient as a lamb, and he blessed the people. When he was covered with blood he raised his eyes and prayed. That is the most marvelous person that I have seen in my life. My wife has not given me a moment of peace because of him. 'Permit not the death of that innocent man!' this is what she has been dinning into my ears since daybreak. I wanted to save him. Twice I went to the bema and spoke to the priests and that mangy rabble. They answered in one voice, raising their heads and opening the jaws to the ears, 'Crucify him!'"

"Didst thou yield to them?" asked Cinna.

"I did, for in the city there would be mobs, and I am here to keep the peace. I must do my duty. I dislike exaggeration, and, besides, I am mortally wearied; but when I undertake a thing, I do not hesitate to sacrifice the life of one man for the general welfare, especially when he is an unknown person whom no one will mention. All the worse for him that he is not a Roman."

"The sun shines not on Rome alone," whispered Antea.

"Divine Antea," answered the procurator, "I might answer that on the whole round of the earth the sun shines on Roman rule; therefore for the good of that rule it is proper to sacrifice everything; and disturbances undermine our authority. It is not my duty to save a man who has no care for his own safety. Whoso does not know how to preserve measure in anything is not a man of judgment. Moreover, he calls himself the Son of God, and disturbs the foundations on which society rests, and therefore harms people. Let him think what he likes in his soul, if he will not raise disturbance. As a man, I protest against his teaching. If I do not believe in the gods, let us concede that it is my affair. Still I recognize the use of religion, and I declare so publicly, for I judge that religion is a curb on people. Horses must be harnessed, and harnessed securely. Finally, death should not be terrible to that Nazarene, for he declares that he will rise from the dead."

Cinna and Antea looked at each other with amazement.

"That he will rise from the dead?"

"Neither more nor less; after three days. So at least his disciples declare. I forgot to ask him myself. For that matter, it is all one, since death liberates a man from promises. And even should he not rise from the dead, he will lose nothing, since, according to his teaching, genuine happiness and eternal life begin only after death. He speaks of this, indeed, as a man perfectly certain."

"A wonderful doctrine," said Antea.

"And these people here cry to thee, 'Crucify him'?" inquired Cinna.

"And I do not even wonder at this, for hatred is the soul of this people, for what, if not hatred, can demand that love be crucified?"

"THE LIVING BREAD"

'TWAS August, and the fierce sun overhead
Smote on the squalid streets of Bethnal Green,
And the pale weaver, through his windows seen
In Spitalfields, look'd thrice dispirited.

I met a preacher there I knew, and said:
"Ill and o'erworked, how fare you in this scene?"
"Bravely!" said he; "for I of late have been Much cheered with thoughts of Christ, the Living Bread."

O, human soul! as long as thou canst so
Set up a mark of everlasting light,
Above the howling senses' ebb and flow.

To cheer thee, and to right thee if thou roam—
Not with lost toil thou laborest through the night!
Thou mak'st the heaven thou hop'st indeed thy home.

MATTHEW ARNOLD.

JEWS IN JERUSALEM

FROM an article on Christian Missions in the Holy Land, which Rev. J. Elder Cumming contributes to the Missionary Review, the following facts are gleaned as to the number of Jews in and around Jerusalem at the present time. The number is variously estimated. By some it is stated as high as 80,000, and by others as low as 10,000. There are two causes which have led to the different estimates. One is the confusion between the Jews who are living within the walls of the city, and those without. The latter are again divisible into those in the immediate neighborhood, commonly known as the "Colonies," and those much farther off, at Jaffa, Carmel and elsewhere, known as the "Agricultural Colonies." These last are not to be reckoned as belonging to Jerusalem. The other cause for uncertainty as to numbers is that the totals have been concealed by the Jews themselves since they are subject to a heavy personal tax. The statement furnished to me gives as the number within the walls of Jerusalem 23,363. There are, besides, thirty "Colonies" in the immediate neighborhood (at Siloam, near the Damascus gate, the Montefiore settlement, etc.). Some of these colonies contain only thirty or forty Jews, while others number 3,000 and under. In all, there are 24,419 Jews in the colonies near Jerusalem, so that within and without the walls, there were last year 47,782 Jews. These receive, according to their need, what is called the "Halooka," contributions to which are made by Jews in various parts of the world. A large number spend all of their time in the study of the sacred books, and are supported entirely by the "Halooka," or by their own private means. Most of the general business in Jerusalem is done by Jews, or is at least divided between them and the Germans.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD IN CUBA

SONGO POST, near Santiago, Cuba.

Some one mails a copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to my army address. I am very grateful, not more that I can enjoy the helpful things on this bridge of print, than because I can take it to the hospital Sunday afternoons and there read it aloud to the sick men; then pass it round among others during the week. I never go to the hospital with papers in my hand without seeing a number rise up in their beds and ask me, "Have you got a CHRISTIAN HERALD, Chaplain?" Their appreciation of it is very apparent. I do not marvel at it, for the HERALD is a sort of epitome of the kind of religion men want: the religion that comes down into their lives in a helpful way. It has become a new protocol in religious things to these men. It turns the man away from non-essential things to a personal, willing, winsome Saviour.

The Nov. 30th number contained an article in which there was the deepest interest among the soldiers—"Helen Gould." I know that Miss Gould is averse to any sort of publicity, but I want to say that no name mentioned in public or private speech in the army rouses so much enthusiasm among the soldiers as hers: the mention of it creates a great outburst of applause.

A friend gave me what had been the footboard of the Spanish war-vessel Viscaya, when she was pounded to pieces by our war-ships. In making a pulpit out of the planks for use here in camp, I got thirty copper nails of a unique pattern, and made in Spain. After giving some of these mementoes to friends here, I had fifteen left, and everybody said, "Send them to Helen Gould." I put them in a box, and gave it to a citizen—a paymasters clerk—to express for me. Through either his dishonesty or carelessness, it was lost. Fortunately I got two more, and these I have sent to Miss Gould.

I hope that THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will continue to come to me while I am at work in the army, for it is a wonderful help. I wish I had fifty copies of it every week for the men to read. Cordially, REV. C. B. CARLISLE,
Chaplain 2d Iowa V. I.

A Wonderful Remedy Discovered For the Cure of

CATARRH AND DEAFNESS

Deaf Ears Unstopped Headache Banished
Eyes, Nose, Throat, Lungs and Stomach Freed From Disease

"After being deaf for five years, one box of your Catarrh Cure cured me."

The above was written to Dr. J. W. Blosser & Son by Mr. Paul Rupert, of Saltville, Pa., and is only one out of hundreds of similar letters. The remedy is applied in the form of a medicated smoke-vapor inhaled from a pipe. By a simple process, which we explain in the directions accompanying the remedy, the medicine is made to enter the middle ear and every passage and cavity in the head, removing the disease from every affected part.

If you wish a sample and full particulars, testimonials, etc., write at once to Dr. J. W. Blosser & Son, 50 Broad St., Atlanta, Ga.

ARE YOUR LUNGS WEAK?

To Every Sufferer from Catarrh, Lung Weakness or Consumption a Great Specialist Sends His New and Wonderful

TREATMENT FREE.

Nearly everybody you meet will regard it as a kind of insult to be asked if they have weak lungs. All seem to have a solid faith in the soundness of their own breathing machine. In cases of trouble they will admit there is a "heavy cold," "a touch of bronchitis," or even "a spell of Asthma," but as to weak or unsound lungs, never, NEVER. Even the poor consumptive who scarcely speaks without coughing, whose cheeks are wasted, hollow and bear the hectic flush of doom, will assure you with glistening eyes that his cold is on the mend and he will be all right when the weather changes.

This is a sad and pitiable form of delusion. It is not our business here to discuss the reason of it. Its prevalence, however, is beyond all doubt, and we feel that we are right in holding it responsible for a neglect of serious lung troubles in ourselves and others—that it is almost criminal.

How many a poor bread-earner there is who keeps on and on at his daily toil, taking cough medicines by fits and starts, but never quite curing his cough, while this same cough is but a symptom of decay that is eating into his lungs, and will in time cause their destruction. Thus does a wife observe her husband, or parents witness the struggle of a darling child, the youth or the maiden who was to rejoice their later years, while no steps are taken to battle with the evil until consumption has seized on one more victim. It is simply terrible to think how far we may be guilty by our indifference to the lung troubles of those near and dear to us. It is also a sad thought that we may hug a delusion as to our own health that we only get rid of when life itself must pay the forfeit.

Let us quit the distressing subject to come to what is practical. Nobody can afford to think lightly of lung troubles. Nobody can afford to be mistaken about their possible dangers. Nobody can afford to neglect them or "let them wear out," or "get better in the spring," or any other tomfoolery that leads only to wreck and ruin. Lung troubles don't move backward. Weak lungs don't grow strong by themselves—you must heal them and strengthen them and rid them of the very earliest germs of disease or you are simply committing a form of suicide. Either you must cure your lung troubles or THEY WILL KILL YOU.

That's the whole situation in a nutshell.

Never was there a cure for lung troubles equal to the newly discovered Dr. Slocum treatment. This forms a system of three remedies that are used simultaneously, and supplement each other's curative action. The treatment [illegible] cures weak lungs, bronchitis, asthma, coughs, consumption, catarrh and every other ailment of the pulmonary region. It destroys every germ that can affect the respiratory system, and even in advanced stages of lung trouble positively arrests the tubercular growth, while it also builds up the patient so that his system is enabled to throw off scrofula, rheumatism and other wasting diseases. Thousands of cured cases already prove these claims. Thousands of grateful people bless the discovery.

Free to... Christian Herald Readers.

The Dr Slocum Treatment is Medicine Reduced to an Exact Science by the World's Most Famous Physician.

Dr. Slocum wants everybody to know the surprising merits of his system. He has arranged to give a free treatment (three bottles of the cure) to all sufferers who will apply to him by letter, mentioning The Christian Herald. Full instructions for use accompany each treatment. Your correspondence on the subject is strictly private and your three free bottles come to you in a plain package. Surely if you have weak lungs you will be glad to get a free treatment that is offered in such a generous spirit.

Write to Dr. T. A. Slocum, 98 Pine St., New York City, giving full address.

Delay only makes your trouble worse.

THE YOUNG MAN IN THE BACK SEAT,

or, The Things that Hinder

BY REV. J. W. WEDDELL

MORE EXCUSES FOR NOT GOING FORWARD

SOME of the excuses that the young man in the back seat of the evangelistic meeting makes when he is invited to go forward were mentioned in these columns last week; but I have heard others, for there seems no lack of ingenuity in raising or suggesting obstacles to this first step toward the better life. One young man responded with:

5. "Something I want to do first."

There is a distinctly worldly trend in this case. Self and self-will stands out clear and strong. "Yes, I want to be a Christian, but I have a plan in mind. There is something else I want to see done first." Do you know him?

The man who has a programme. What shall we do with him? He is not to be given wholesale rebuke. Too many go aimless and idealless through life. But where one's aims and plans run counter to the calls of the Word and the swift intimations of the Spirit, they are to be abandoned at once.

"I am the man who wouldn't let go." So spoke up a happy-faced Christian to me once when I halted a moment for recognition. Then it was recalled. The anxious, weary inquirer, seeking salvation, but demanding it by his own schedule and his own way. Here was the text that went like an arrow to his heart: "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts," just let go! That was the message. And he did it — and grace took hold. I wish you were as happy as he.

6. "The world is too much for me."

It is a merry, happy-hearted lad that says that to you. He loves a good time —and who does not? And he fears that he cannot stand out against the allurements of the world. "It's too much for me," he says. "I've tried it, and when the temptation comes, I yield every time."

Yes, and you will continue to yield and break down every time until you cease experimenting and set your foot down for an out and out life of faith and trust. It is a question of the relation of things. What is first with you—this world or the next? "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added, i.e., come in as additional, supplementary. I have asked many times and on many platforms, even in the Quaker City, Who has seen "Shekinah avenue?" No one has yet responded. And yet I passed it, lettered large, in Old Philadelphia, many and many a time. But it was back almost out of sight, on a little narrow lane, in the midst of the zig-zag streets of the older city. No wonder men miss it. Where is the Shekinah in your life?

7. "I can't live up to it."

He means the new life. It was the old world-life in the former case. It is the new life in Christ in this case. "It's a right life to live," he says, "but the demands are too great for me; I can't live up to it."

"It!" There is the bane and the source of mischief. It, It! Get your mind off it, fix the thought upon Him. The Christian life is not it, but Him.

There is altogether too much talking about the religious life, too little actual living of it; too much trying in our own strength, too little trusting in the divine strength. Do not prate or prattle about the symptoms of disease, bring yourself to the great Physician and let him attend to your case. A woman came to Dr. Abercrombie, across the water, and held out her hand, swollen and red. "Bruise?" he asked. "Burn," she responded. "Poultice," quoth he. A little later she returned. "Better?" asked the physician. "Worse," said the woman. "More poultice," he said. Still later she came again. "Better?" he once more asked. "Well," said she, and added: "fee." "Madame," he broke out, "nothing at all. I never saw so sensible a woman in all my life." Bring your case and submit it. That is all.

8. "I want to know more about it."

Evidently this young man is interested. You can see this in his constant attendance and in his eager attention to the truth as presented. But he makes no progress; you find him at the close of the meetings just where he was at the finish. "I want to know more about this," he says, "after that I will act."

Young man, you will never know more until you act up to the light you have. "Then shall ye know if ye follow on to know the Lord." After all, you know enough. You know you are a sinner. You know Christ is a Saviour. Make him your Saviour. Act.

Take the truth you have and walk in the light. Thus comes all progress and growth. Young Tholuck came to Neander utterly infidel and adrift. "Is there anything you believe in?" Yes, he believed in the integrity and logical coherence of John's Gospel. "Take that and study it." He did so; it led on to an acceptance of the whole Book and the Christ of the Book. Live up to what you already know.

The view above is from the regular title plate of an elegantly illustrated, eight-page semi-monthly paper devoted to health, horticulture, and home-building in California. It presents plans by which homes can be most easily acquired, and investments most safely made, and by which orchards can be developed, the crops harvested and the returns made to Eastern owners. It treats of the rainfall, temperature and climate, as it affects health and vegetation. It deals with the church, social and educational conditions. It gives California market quotations, and the freight and passenger rates from prominent Eastern points to that State. If you're at all interested in the Golden State, this paper will surely interest you, and for 24 CENTS in stamps, we will send it to you for one year. At this price there is good value in it we assure you.

FOSTER & WOODSON, COR. BROADWAY AND 26th ST., NEW YORK.

A Progressive Community

We recently paid a visit to Maywood Colony, which embraces the land surrounding Corning, twelve miles north of here, in Tehama County, and were, to put it mildly, surprised to find the many changes that have taken place in a few short years. It has been but a little while since Maywood Colony and vicinity was on a par with the other small towns in the Sacramento Valley—plenty of good land with an agreeable climate, and the land owned principally by a class of people that could not see or understand the natural advantages and value of the country further than the number of sacks of wheat per acre the land would produce.

But now what a change! Costly and substantial brick and frame business and dwelling houses building in the town and country surrounding; hundreds of acres of orchard and vineyard being set out yearly, much of which is just coming into bearing, and furnishing employment to many laborers, and, above all, recruits are daily added to the intelligent, happy and thrifty citizens who people Maywood Colony.

Since the fire at Corning, some three months since, there have been built and in course of construction eight brick business buildings, and Foster & Woodson have nearly completed a handsome three-story frame hotel.

This hotel, when completed, will be one of the finest in the Sacramento Valley, and will be furnished in the very best style and contain all the [illegible]

The colonists all build comfortable houses, and are happy and contented. Their orchards and vineyards in bearing this year furnished a good yield, and the prices received were considerably above market quotations, which fact proves the excellence of their products.

They have in their plat every kind of citrus and deciduous fruits, vegetables, grasses, clovers and flowers. They are successfully growing the orange, lemon, lime, pomelo, banana, pepper, peach, plum, prune, apricot, apple, black and English walnut, palms and other ornamental shrubbery, melons and vegetables of all kinds, rice, tobacco, corn, cotton, and flowers too numerous to mention. They have one mammoth coxcomb, with a flower that measures two feet eight inches in circumference and nineteen inches across.

When Foster & Woodson started Maywood Colony they had many obstacles to overcome, but they have made of the proposition a splendid and lasting success.

Sugar Cane Finds its Home at Maywood

"We wish it were possible to imbue every man, but especially every young man, with the desire of having a HOME of his own—a home to be adhered to through life. Next to the home itself, an earnest, overruling DESIRE for one would be a great blessing. 'A man who owns the roof which shelters him and the soil from which he draws his subsistence—and few acres are requisite for that—need not envy any nabob's great fortune,' said Horace Greeley and so say we. We have been saying this, in effect, for the past eight years, and have induced over 600 Eastern people to take steps in that direction. We want a thousand more home-builders to go to Maywood Colony. We have ample room for them all. It is not our aim to allure from comfortable Eastern homes those who are settled and satisfied, but we are reaching for those who are not satisfied and for those without homes. This is not a purely philanthropic proposition, for we make a reasonable profit on every piece of land that we sell—the profit that comes from buying land at wholesale and selling it at retail. Yet, for a given sum, we offer to the home-seeker the most value that is obtainable in California, and our plan for growing orchards for absentees is unapproached. In this prosperous, healthful, and pleasant settlement you can get a 10-acre lot for $500.00, a 5-acre lot for $250.00 or a 2 1-2-acre lot for $150.00. The terms required are within the reach of all. If so desired, you can remain where you are and have your land planted and cared for. This phase of our plan makes it as good for women as for men. Whether or not it is needed now, it is the duty of all to provide—as soon as possible—a home for old age. If you desire to look into this matter, send us your name and address, and maps, plats, and particulars will be sent to you. This proposition is all that we claim—otherwise we could not buy this space from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD through which to place our plan before its readers. QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Adam W., Virden, Can. Is the college that Gen. Kitchener proposes to build in memory of Gen. Gordon to be strictly Christian or anti-

The institution is designed to be educational and industrial, and it is stated in the dispatches that it is to be conducted on purely secular lines; but it is impossible to conceive of any memorial to Gen. Gordon which would fail to recognize, in a pronounced manner, that religion which was more to him than life itself. In any event, we do not believe the college will be anti-Christian.

J. A. H., Tarrytown, N. Y. What is the meaning of the new wine in old bottles, etc., Matt. 9:16,17?

The bottles used in those times were made of skins, usually those of goats. When they became old they were liable to break under the pressure of fermenting wine. Christ used the simile to show his hearers that Christianity could not be a mere addition to Judaism. The old dispensation was at an end, sacrifices and the temple ritual were superseded. The new life must have new forms of manifestation.

Reader, North, S. C. Please give all the information you can regarding the influence the New York Cotton Exchange has on the price of cotton.

The purpose of the Exchange is to regulate prices according to the supply and demand; to adopt classification standards and disseminate useful information, and, generally, to increase and facilitate the cotton trade. It is an influential body, like all the other exchanges, and is well managed. A membership costs $10,000 at initiation. Trading is done in cotton "spot," "to arrive" "free on board," "in transit" and for "future delivery." Nearly 500,000 bales of cotton have been stored in New York at one time. Manufacturing firms and corporations in many States accept the Exchange's quotations as a standard for their own purchases.

E., Giffords, N. Y. How did Spain become possessor of Mexico? How many wars have there been in Mexico, and by whom? When was Christianity introduced in Mexico?

In 1518 Cortez conquered Mexico for Spain. It belonged to Spain until 1821, when it became a republic. There have been many revolutions, and several attempts to make it an empire, but it has remained true to republican principles. The first Christian missionaries went to Mexico in 1522.

Mrs. F. N. S., Lafayette, La. Can you kindly tell me where I can obtain the names of the soldiers from the State of Maryland, who served in the Revolutionary War?

Through the courtesy of the Chief of the Record and Pension Office, Washington, D. C. (to whom we wrote for this information for the benefit of a number of enquirers), we are enabled to answer as follows:

[illegible] made to this Department from the collection of Revolutionary War records in its custody, from which the names of the soldiers of the State of Maryland, or any other State, who served prominently in that war can be readily ascertained, and, in view of the limited clerical force allowed by law and the pressure of other current business, it is deemed impracticable to undertake such a compilation or to prepare a list of such soldiers at the present time. There were in the Revolutionary War from the State of Maryland, thirteen regiments, two battalions and three independent companies, aggregating about 6,181 men, not including the officers and men from that State who served in the Continental [illegible] Act of Congress approved July 27, 1892, and August 18, 1894, respectively, the military records of the War of the Revolution and of the War of 1812, should be transferred from the various Executive Departments to the War Department "to be preserved, indexed and prepared for publication." The Department cannot now indicate even an approximate date for the proposed publication.

J. M., Valatie, N. Y.; M. E. J., Beaman, Ia., and others. What was the mark set upon Cain, as mentioned in Genesis 4:15?

We do not know. There are no records of Cain outside of the Bible, and those, as you know, are meagre. Is there any benefit in finding out details about the man, even if it were possible? His mark and his wife and his city are of no interest to any one. He was a murderer of a very mean type, and no good can come of speculating about him.

1. In order to make a reliable calculation a date should be fixed, as the difference in time varies according to the season of the year. The average difference is about four minutes. The motion of the earth on its axis is strictly uniform, and sidereal time or "star time" is of unvarying uniformity. It is not a complete rotation of the earth, the alternation of light and darkness, that constitutes a day. This is called a civil or solar day, and is measured between two meridian passages of the sun, and is about four minutes longer than the sidereal day. The cause of the change is this: When the earth has made one complete turn, so as to bring the meridian of the place to the same position among the fixed stars as when it was noon the day before, the sun has apparently moved eastward nearly one degree among the stars, and it takes the earth about four minutes more to overtake it. If the diurnal motion of the sun were uniform, the length of the solar day would be as simple and easily determined as that of the sidereal day. 2. WORKING FOR AN EDUCATION

How a Tennessee College Provides a College Training in Return for Farm Work

EVERY minister and editor is familiar with the inquiry which comes to him from all sections of the country: "Where can a poor young man go to obtain a college education in return for honest work?" "Is there any institution at which I could earn enough by my labor to support myself while I get an education?" The trustees of the famous old Washington College in East Tennessee are trying to give a practical answer to these questions.

Dr. W. B. Rankin, one of the trustees, says: "In 1893 the old college modified its classical methods and set to work to meet modern demands. A farm of one hundred acres was purchased and an industrial department established. Results have been gratifying. About twenty-five students each year are thereby enabled to meet the expense of living. At the same time they acquire a skill in common pursuits which will be invaluable. A practical education is thus placed within the reach of the poorest, if capable and industrious. The college is situated precisely in the district in which such advantages are appreciated. It is in the darkest portion, intellectually considered, of the United States. I mean the great Appalachian belt, which extends 500 miles northeast and southwest, and is about 250 miles wide. This belt overlies nearly the whole of West Virginia, and parts of Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, Kentucky, North Carolina, Tennessee, Georgia and Alabama. In it there exist, for the most part, the most illiterate people of the States it touches. There are the 'Crackers' of Georgia and Alabama, the 'poor whites' of North Carolina, the 'Covites' (the poor dwellers in shut-in mountain valleys) of Tennessee, and the rude, though sturdy and sterling, mountain folk of Tennessee, Kentucky and the Virginias. All these people are uneducated, and are ignorant even of the things they should know best—how to make the most of their situation.

"We found that the young women of East Tennessee and in the adjoining portions of Kentucky and Virginia—for Washington College is in the corner formed by these three States—do not need or care for Latin and Greek. They need and want industrial education that will fit them for their life work We now teach them how to lead best the kind of life they are likely to follow in their mountain homes. We have more applications from those who want an education than we can accept."

It has been found that the average proportion above mentioned can be maintained. Four acres of land will produce sufficient to keep one student, and he need spend but very little more time in labor than the average college student spends in athletic sports. The accompanying illustrations are from photographs, showing the students at their work.

Characteristic of their stock, many are bright, plucky and eager to grasp opportunities to help themselves. Some have walked over one hundred miles to avail themselves of such chances. The test made has solved the supreme question with these people—how to meet the living expenses of their children while being educated. Encouraged by the success of this method, the trustees now propose to enlarge their farm. Land near the college can be bought for from $15 to $25 per acre. The cost of a year's living in some colleges—$150—will buy and stock enough land to support a student each year. Thus, for every four acres given and stocked, the college will undertake to give an education year by year to any student who is not afraid of hard work.

Rev. Jas. T. Cooter, President of the college, is a graduate of Princeton. Speaking recently of the past history of Washington College, he said:

"It was founded by Scotch-Irish Presbyterians in 1780, amid hostile Cherokees, in the territory of the Watauga Association—famous as the first attempt at free government on the part of native Americans. It was chartered as Martin Academy, in 1783, and as Washington College, in 1795. It may be called a child of Princeton, its founder, the Rev. Samuel Doak, D.D., being a graduate of that institution. Its first gift was a tract of land from Col. Waitstill Avery, a signer of the historic 'Mecklinburg Declaration.' Among its charter trustees were Gov. John Sevier and others who fought at the battle of King's mountain, which Jefferson claimed as the turning point in the war for American liberty. It has sent forth numbers of useful men in every generation since its origin — such as Hon. John Blair, Laudon C. Haynes, N. G. Taylor, Dr. J. G. M. Ramsey, Senator Z. B. Vance, and Judge O. P. Temple. The array of pulpit orators is remarkable: Dr. David Nelson, author of Cause and Cure of Infidelity, and the hymn, 'My Days are Gliding Swiftly By,' etc.; Gideon Blackburn, founder of Blackburn University, and James Gallaher, whose fame as an evangelist was national.

"Though dismantled and almost ruined during the civil war, it now has a fair property. At the close of the war it possessed only two buildings and sixteen acres of land, and that encumbered by a debt greater than the total valuation. Now it has six buildings in good condition and entire equipment valued at $45,000—and no debt. Its policy is to incur none."

Contributions toward the cost of supporting free students, buying books for the library and instruments and appliances for the class room, or toward the purchase of land, may be sent to the Treasurer, E. H. West, Washington College, Washington Co., Tenn. He or Rev. Jas. T. Cooter, the President, or Dr. W. B. Rankin, 305 West 113th St., New York, will be pleased to furnish further particulars on application.

A Temple Transformed

In the current number of The Missionary Review is an interesting report of the transfer of a Buddhist temple to Christian missions. It says:

The gift of a Buddhist temple to the Ningpo mission has excited great attention as an unprecedented incident in the history of missions. The official account says that when Rev. J. W. Haywood asked the villagers (two hundred had assembled) if they were willing it should be used as a preaching hall and school, the answer was universal assent. Not only so, when one of the head men said they would convey it by a legal deed of gift, all present shouted "Quite right, quite right." The British consul pronounced the deed legally valid. In addition to the temple and its demesne, twenty-two acres of land have also been conveyed.

BURDEN-BEARING

A Sermon by
T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D.,
On the Text: Gal. 6: 2:

Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ.

EVERY man for himself! If there be room for only one more passenger in the lifeboat, get in yourself. If there be a burden to lift, you supervise while others shoulder it. You be the digit while others are the ciphers on the right hand side—nothing in themselves but augmenting you. In opposition to that theory of selfishness Paul advances in my text the Gospel theory: "Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ."

Everybody has burdens. Sometimes they come down upon the shoulders, sometimes they come down upon the head, sometimes they come down upon the heart. Looking over any assembly, they all seem well and bright and easy; but each one has a burden to lift, and some of them have more than they can lift. Paul proposes to split up these burdens into fragments. You take part of mine and I must take part of yours, and each one will take part of the other's, and so we will fulfil the law of Christ.

Mrs. Appleton, of Boston, the daughter of Daniel Webster, was dying after long illness. The great lawyer after pleading an important case in the courtroom, on his way home stopped at the house of his daughter and went into her sick-room. She said to him: "Father, why are you out to-day in this cold weather without an overcoat?" The great lawyer went into the next room and was in a flood of tears, saying, "Dying herself, yet thinking only of me." Oh, how much more beautiful is care for others than this everlasting taking care of ourselves. High up in the wall of the Temple of Baalbec there are three stones, each weighing eleven hundred tons. They were lifted up by a style of machinery that is now among the lost arts. But in my text is the Gospel machinery, by which the vaster and the heavier tonnage of the world's burden is to be lifted from the crushed heart of the human race. What you and I most need to learn is the spirit of helpfulness.

Encourage the merchant. If he have a superior style of goods, tell him so. If he have with his clerks adorned the show windows and the shelves, compliment his taste. If he have a good business locality, if he have had great success, if he have brilliant prospects for the future, recognize all this. Be not afraid that he will become arrogant and puffed up by your approval. Before night some shop-going person will come in and tell him that his prices are exorbitant and that his goods are of an inferior quality, and that his show window gave promise of far better things than he found inside. Before the night of the day in which you say encouraging words to that merchant there will be some crank, male or female, who will come into the store and depreciate everything, and haul down enough goods from the shelves to fit out a family for a whole winter without buying a cent's worth. If the merchant be a grocer there will be some one before night who will come into his establishment, and taste of this and taste of that and taste of everything else, in that way stealing all the profits of anything that he may purchase—buying three apples while he is eating one orange! Before the night of the day when you approve that merchant, he will have a bad debt which he will have to erase, a bad debt made by some one who has moved away from the neighborhood without giving any hint of the place of destination. Before night that merchant will hear that some style of goods of which he has a large supply is going out of fashion, and there will be some one who will come into the store and pay a bill under protest, saying he has paid it before, but the receipt has been lost. Now, encourage that merchant, not fearing that he will become arrogant or puffed up, for there will be before night enough unpleasant things said to keep him from becoming apoplectic with plethora of praise.

Encourage newspaper men. If you knew how many annoyances they have, if you understood that their most elaborate article is sometimes flung out because there is such great pressure on the columns, and that an accurate report of a speech is expected although the utterance be so indistinct the discourse is one long stenographic guess, and that the midnight which finds you asleep demands that they be awake, and that they are sometimes ground between the wheels of our great brain manufactories; sickened at the often approach of men who want complimentary newspaper notices, or who want newspaper retraction; one day sent to report a burial, the next day to report a pugilistic encounter; shifted from place to place by sudden revolution which is liable to take place any day in our great journalistic establishments; precarious life becoming more and more precarious—if you understood it, you would be more sympathetic. Be affable when you have not an axe to be sharpened on their grindstone. Discuss in your mind what the nineteenth century would be without the newspaper, and give encouraging words to all who are engaged in this interest, from the chief of editorial department down to the boy that throws the morning or evening newspaper into your basement window.

Encourage mechanics. They will plumb the pipes, or they will kalsomine the ceilings, or they will put down the carpets, or they will grain the doors, or they will fashion the wardrobe. Be not among those who never say anything to a mechanic except to find fault. If he has done a job well, tell him it is splendidly done. Be not among those employers who never say anything to their employees except to swear at them. Do not be afraid you will make that mechanic so puffed up and arrogant he will never again want to be seen with working-apron or in shirt sleeves.

Encourage the farmers. They come into your stores, you meet them in the city markets, you often associate with them in the summer months. Office-seekers go through the land and they stand on political platforms, and they tell the farmers the story about the independent life of a farmer, giving flattery where they ought to give sympathy. Independent of what? I was brought up on a farm, I worked on a farm, I know all about it. I hardly saw a city until I was grown, and I tell you that there are no class of people in this country who have it harder and who more need your sympathy than farmers. Independent of what? Of the curculio that stings the peach trees? of the rust in the wheat? of the long rain with the rye down? Independent of the grasshopper? of the locust? of the army worm? of the potato bug? Independent of the drought that burns up the harvest? Independent of the cow with the hollow horn? or the sheep with the foot rot? or the pet horse with a nail in his hoof? Independent of the cold that freezes out the winter grain? Independent of the snowbank out of which he must shovel himself? Independent of the cold weather when he stands threshing his numbed fingers around his body to keep them from being frosted? Independent of the frozen ears and the frozen feet? Independent of what? Fancy farmers who have made their fortunes in the city and go out in the country to build houses with all the modern improvements, and make farming a luxury, may not need any solace: but the yeomanry who get their living out of the soil, and who that way have to clothe their families and educate their children, and pay their taxes and meet the interest on mortgaged farms—such men find a terrific struggle. I demand that office-seekers and politicians fold up their gaseous and imbecile speeches about the independent life of a farmer, and substitute some word of comfort drawn from the fact that they are free from city conventionalities and city epidemics and city temptations. My most vivid remembrance of boyhood is of my father coming in on a very hot day from the harvest-field, and seating himself on the door-sill because he was too faint to get into the house, the perspiration streaming from forehead and from chin, and my mother trying to resuscitate him with a cup of cold water which he was too faint to hold to his own lips, while saying to us: "Don't be frightened; there's nothing the matter; a little tired that's all, a little tired." Ever since that day when I hear people talking about the independent life of a farmer I see through the sham. Farmers want not your flatteries but your sympathies.

Encourage the doctors. You praise the doctor when he brings you up from an awful crisis of disease, but do you praise the doctor when through skilful treatment of the incipient stages of disease, he keeps you from sinking down to the awful crisis? There is a great deal of cheap and heartless wit about doctors, but I notice that the people who get off that wit are the first to send for a doctor when there is anything the matter. There are those who undertake to say in our day that doctors are really useless. One man has written a book entitled, "Every Man His Own Doctor." That author ought to write one more book entitled, "Every Man His own Undertaker."

Physicians have so many hardships, so many interruptions, so many annoyances. I am glad they have so many encouragements. All doors open to them. They are welcome to mansion and to cot. Little children shout when they see them coming down the road, and the aged, recognizing the step, look up and say, "Doctor, is that you?" They stand between our families and the grave, fighting back the troops of disorder that come up from their encampment by the cold river. No one hears such thanks as the doctor hears. They are eyes to the blind, they are feet to the lame, their path is strewn with the benedictions of those whom they have befriended.

One day there was a dreadful foreboding in our house. All hope was gone. The doctor came four times that day. The children put away their toys and all walked on tip-toe, and at the least sound said: "Hush!" How loudly the clock did tick, and how the banister creaked, though we tried to keep it so still. That night the doctor stayed all night. He concentred all his skill upon the sufferer. At last the restlessness of the sufferer subsided into a calm, sweet slumber, and the doctor looked up and smiled and said: "The crisis is past." When propped up with pillows, in the easy chair, she sat, and the south wind tried to blow a rose-leaf into the faded cheek, and the children brought flowers—the one a red clover top: the other a violet from the lawn—to the lap of the convalescent, and Bertha stood on a high chair with a brush smoothing her mother's hair, and we were told in a day or two she might ride out, joy came back to our house. And as we helped the old country doctor into his gig, we noticed not that the step was broken, or the horse stiff in the knees, and we all realized for the first time in our life what doctors were worth. Encourage them.

Encourage the lawyers. They are often cheated out of their fees, and so often have to breathe the villainous air of courtrooms, and they so often have to bear ponderous responsibility, and they have to maintain against the sharks in their profession the dignity of that calling which was honored by the fact that the only man allowed to stand on Mount Sinai beside the Lord was Moses, the lawyer, and that the Bible speaks of Christ as the advocate. Encourage lawyers in their profession of transcendent importance—a profession honored by having on the bench a Chief Justice Story and at the bar a Rufus Choate.

Encourage the teachers in our public schools—occupation arduous and poorly compensated. In all the cities when there comes a fit of economy on the part of officials, the first thing to do is always to cut down teachers' salaries. To take forty or fifty boys whose parents suppose them precocious and keep the parents from finding out their mistake; to take as [illegible] pectation of parents who think their children at fifteen years of age ought to be [illegible] system, is a very arduous work. Encourage them by the usefulness and the everlastingness and the magnitude of their occupation, and when your children do well, compliment the instructor, praise the teacher, thank the educator.

Encourage all invalids by telling them how many you have known with the same ailments who got well, and not by telling them of their sunken eye, or asking them whether the color of their cheek is really hectic, or mentioning cases in which that style of disease ended fatally, or telling them how badly they look. Cheerful words are more soothing than chloral, more stimulating than cognac, more tonic than bitters. Many an invalid has recovered through the influence of cheerful surroundings.

Encourage all starting in life by yourself becoming reminiscent. Established merchants, by telling these young merchants when you got your first customer, and how you sat behind the counter eating your luncheon with one eye on the door. Established lawyers, encourage young lawyers by telling of the time when you broke down in your first speech. Established ministers of the Gospel, encourage young ministers by merciful examination of theological candidates, not walking around with a profundity and overwhelmingness of manner as though you were one of the eternal decrees. Doctors established, by telling young doctors how you yourself once mistook the measles for scarlatina. And if you have nothing to say that is encouraging, O, man! put your teeth tightly together and cover them with the curtain of your lip; compress your lips and put your hand over your mouth and keep still.

A gentleman was passing along, crossing a bridge in Germany, and a lad came along with a cage of birds for sale. The stranger said, "How much for those birds and the cage?" The price was announced, the purchase was made, and the first thing the stranger did was to open the door of the cage and the birds flew out into the sun-light and the forest. Some one who saw the purchase and the liberation said: "What did you do that for?" "Ah!" said the stranger, "I was a captive myself once, and I know how good it is to be free." Oh, ye who remember hardships in early life but have come beyond those hardships, sympathize with those who are in the struggle! Free yourself, help others to get free. Governor Alexander Stephens persisted in having business matters brought to his bedside. There was on that table a letter from a poor woman in the penitentiary, written and signed by herself alone. Dying Alexander Stephens said: "You think that because I have been ill so many times and got well, I shall get well now, but you are mistaken; I shall not recover. Where is that letter by that woman in the penitentiary? I think she has suffered enough. As near as I can tell she has no friends. Bring me that paper that I may sign her pardon." A gentleman standing by, thinking this too great a responsibility for the sick man, said: Governor, you are very sick now; perhaps you had better wait till to-morrow; you may feel stronger and you may feel better." Then the eye of the old governor flashed, and he said: "I know what I am about." Putting his signature to that pardon, he wrote the last word he ever wrote, for then the pen fell from his pale and rheumatic and dying hand forever. Oh, my soul, how beautiful that the closing hours of life should be spent in helping one who had no helper!

Encourage the troubled by thoughts of release and reassociation. Encourage the aged by thoughts of eternal juvenescence. Encourage the herdsman amid the troughs of sin, to go back to the banquet at the father's homestead. Give us tones in the major key instead of the minor. Give us "Coronation" instead of "Naomi." You have seen cars so arranged that one car going down the hill rolled another car up the hill. They nearly balanced each other. And every man that finds life up-hill, ought to be helped by those who have passed the heights and are descending to the vale. Oh, let us bear one another's burdens!

All United Against Polygamy

Ex-Senator Edmunds' Bugle-Call Rouses the Nation to Action

People Everywhere Opposing the Mormon Invasion of Congress, and Loudly Demanding the Expulsion of Roberts, the Confessed Polygamist—General Eaton's View of the Case

THE great battle against polygamy has opened in earnest. With the simultaneous publication, last week, in every leading newspaper throughout the Union, of the ringing exposure and denunciation of the Mormon evil by ex-United States Senator George F. Edmunds, in a letter of national importance addressed to the editor of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, there has come a sudden stirring of the nation's energies. In that letter, the distinguished statesman and author of the Anti-Polygamy Law clearly pointed out the peril that threatened Congress and the country at large from the defiant attitude of the polygamists, and set forth unanswerable reasons why Roberts, the Mormon Congressman-elect, should be expelled from the House of Representatives under the constitutional provision which empowers Congress to act in such cases.

Public Gatherings in Many States

The Senator's able letter has been received with universal demonstrations of approval. Public gatherings held at many points have made it a subject of enthusiastic discussion. In several State Legislatures, resolutions have been introduced requesting Congress to exercise its prerogative and refuse to sit with Roberts. Ministerial bodies in Ohio, Colorado, Kansas, Connecticut and other States have adopted similar resolutions for presentation to the National Legislature. In every instance the praise of Senator Edmund's pure and patriotic letter has been liberal and spontaneous.

As announced in last week's issue, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has secured from Gen. John Eaton, ex-United States Commissioner of Education and long resident in Utah, the following letter on the Roberts case, which is scarcely secondary in interest and importance to the remarkable contribution of Senator Edmunds. Gen. Eaton, while in Utah, had abundant facilities for investigating the Mormon system and the series of letters from his pen, which appeared in this journal in the winter of 1896-97, made the deepest impression upon the national mind and conscience, and were largely instrumental in bringing about the great popular uprising which now threatens to sweep away the last remnants of Mormon political power in the nation, by forever shutting the doors of Congress against polygamists.

General Eaton's letter is as follows:

"To the Editor of 'The Christian Herald:'

"Roberts was convicted of violating the Edmunds law, and was punished. The pardons granted by President Harrison were conditioned upon the giving up of polygamy. Roberts has never given up polygamy, and therefore, he is not entitled to that amnesty or pardon. All who were polygamists and did not receive the benefit of that pardon were not entitled to vote—were not citizens. Mr. Cleveland carefully made the same discrimination against those who had not given up polygamy. Roberts, therefore, as an unpardoned criminal, is not entitled to vote or hold office under the constitution of Utah, and is therefore of course disqualified for admission as a member of the House of Representatives.

"There can be no ex post facto law or retroactive legislation under the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution adopted by the State of Utah prohibits polygamy in the strongest terms, but each legislature has refused to enact any State law in accordance with this provision punishing polygamy. But the new Constitution provides that 'all the laws of the Territory of Utah now in force, not repugnant to this Constitution, shall remain in force.' And the act punishing polygamy is specially declared to be in force. One decision of a U. S. court has been made in accordance with this view. This, of course, forbids the cohabitation of a man with more than one wife. The attitude of every member of Congress, from States other than Utah, will personally be against polygamy. But Mormons touch the political nerve widely both by the influence of money and by votes. Roberts will seek admission in accordance with the usual forms of law. He will have a large majority behind him and a Governor's certificate of election. On these points there can be no question.

What Will Congress Do?

"What Congress will do depends upon how far the members of the House will respond to the Ten Commandments and the sentiments of the people.

"The House of Representatives is the absolute and sole judge of the election, returns and qualifications of its members, and may expel a member by a two-thirds vote. No compliance with the forms of their State Constitution prohibiting polygamy. But this would be repudiation of the most sacred pledges they made to secure Statehood. This large majority in favor of Roberts will naturally be construed as indicating a disposition on the part of his supporters and the Mormon leaders to practice their religion, as they call practicing polygamy, without regard to the State Constitution, and the manifesto of their leaders against plural marriages, and all the most solemn assurances given the American people against polygamy.

A Stringent Anti-Polygamy Law Needed

"It is a notable fact that the Governor of Utah, who is a Mormon, but not a polygamist, plead with the people not to elect Roberts. There is no doubt a considerable body of Mormons who would be true to the pledges of the leaders and the assurances given the American people. There can be no question, should the sentiment against polygamy take such a hold in the public mind, that the House of Representatives will exercise its authority in keeping Roberts out. The present Congress should aid to that end by going to the extent of its Constitutional rights in legislating against polygamy as a crime.

APOSTLE HEBER J. GRANT

"The whole situation would be greatly simplified if an amendment to the national constitution could be adopted prohibiting polygamy. The press, the pulpit, the forum, every expression of opinion, every voice can be so lifted up against this evil, which destroys the sacredness of the home, degrades man and brutalizes woman, that no polygamist will dare to offer himself for recognition in a national office.

Washington, D. C. "JOHN EATON."

It is evident that the Mormon Church and State officials in Utah are in great trepidation over the popular uprising, which threatens the entire Mormon fabric. Lorenzo Snow, President and head of the Mormon Church, has issued a long statement in which he declares that plural marriages have ceased forever in Utah, and that Roberts was not elected to Congress as a Mormon. Both assertions, however, are flatly contradicted by the facts. The Presbytery of Utah has declared publicly over their signatures that no less than 2,000 polygamous marriages have taken place in Utah within two years, and it is admitted by prominent Mormons that he was elected through the influence of the Mormon Church, his nomination by the Congressional Convention being brought about through the personal efforts of Heber J. Grant.

AMELIA PALACE, THE HOME OF BRIGHAM YOUNG'S FAVORITE WIFE

law and no large majority of any people should justify a criminal in sitting in the House of Representatives; and what the House will do about a polygamist depends entirely upon its own judgment. It should be remembered that Roberts was elected over two opponents, both Mormons, but neither of them a polygamist, thus indicating that his promoters preferred a polygamist. This indicates the strength of the sentiment among polygamists. Under Statehood, the people of Utah have control of their own marriage and divorce laws, and may repeal the provision in

ON THE VALDEZ TRAIL

Preaching the Gospel Amid Glaciers, Blizzards, Snow-Slides and Fields of Flowers

OUR front-page picture (which was taken expressly for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD by our artist who accompanied the party photographed), will be appreciated by our readers as giving a very realistic glimpse of one of the more pleasing features of the Valdez Trail to the Alaskan Gold Fields. The preacher is Rev. F. L. Benedict, with whose work among miners and prospecting parties in Alaska our readers are already familiar. The place is "Camp First Timber," on the Klutina River, and just off the glacier.

Along the trail camps were located from three to five miles apart, each camp consisting of from twenty-five to one hundred tents. In winter, services would be held, of course, inside a tent; but in that section winter was a question less of time than of distance. This party pictured has just passed from the snow and ice and blinding blizzards of the Valdez Glacier into the balmy, beautiful summer of the Valdez Valley. Above and behind glittering peaks of tall mountains rose into the blue sky; the valley, and the hillsides descending into it were living green, where they were not a blaze of bloom. There was a marvelous wealth of wild flowers: buds and blossoms everywhere. Lakes often gave back in reflection whole sheets of pink or purple, or whatever tint the flowers happened to be. There were song birds that sang all night.

Only a few days before, this party had been struggling with mid-winter in the glacier. From the landing at Valdez the journey had been one of untold hardships and perils; many who had started were not with their comrades now; some had wisely turned back; others had perished, the very secret of their graves locked in the avalanche that had crushed them. The Valdez Trail had never before been traveled by white men.

There were storms so fierce they could not see ten feet ahead. Snowslides rushed down hill with a roar like thunder. Three avalanches rolled right through the camp; one covered about thirty people; two were taken out dead. A dog buried in one of these slides was taken out alive eight days after. How he had existed packed in the snow and without air or food is a mystery, but a fact all the same. One snow-storm, lasting eight days, held the party at the foot of the summit of the glacier. Firewood gave out, and they were using up their boxes and candles with which to warm tea or coffee. They kept alive by staying in their sleeping-bags (great sacks made of furs and mackinaw blankets), all the time. Several days before the storm, four or six of the party had started off to "Camp First Timber" for wood and other supplies; and much fear was entertained that they had perished on the way. As soon as the weather permitted, the summit camp broke and set out towards "Camp First Timber." After a short march, they looked down to see a relief party led by their friends.

During all of these trials and hardships the faithful missionary shared the labors and troubles of the men, and exercised a wholesome influence, felt by every man. Time often hung heavy in camp; some liked to listen to him for that, if nothing more, and were influenced all the same. Almost all of them came to like him, and when those who knew him heard that he was on the trail, they would come miles to listen to him. This party with whom he struggled through the hardships and dangers of the Valdez Glacier found no gold, but let us trust many found something far better—a hope in Christ.

CHRIST'S DIVINE AUTHORITY

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 12. John 5 : 17-27
Golden Text, John 4 : 42

BY MRS. M. BAXTER.

IT was in the early days of his ministry that persecution commenced against Jesus Christ, the Son of God. He had healed the impotent man at the pool of Bethesda on the Sabbath day. The criticising Jews who always dogged the footsteps of God's Christ (Luke 5 : 17, 30; 6: 7-11; 7: 30, etc., etc.), said unto him that was cured, "It is the Sabbath day, it is not lawful for thee to carry thy bed." "He that made me whole," was the answer, "the same said unto me, Take up thy bed and walk." Senseless objection! How could the poor man leave his rug under the feet of the many who thronged the pool of Bethesda! and how could he remain lying upon his rug when he was perfectly well? Would it not have been breaking the Sabbath far more to trouble his friends to carry him home on his bed, than simply to roll it up and bear it away on his shoulder? They asked the healed man who it was that gave him this command, probably knowing well what the answer would be. And though the healed man did not know at the time, yet when Jesus met him in the temple with the significant words, "Behold, thou art made whole, sin no more lest a worse thing come unto thee," the man departed and told them it was Jesus that had made him whole.

This work of healing was made a pretext for the persecution of Jesus, "because he had done these things on the Sabbath day!" He had not labored: for labor on the Sabbath was forbidden by the law, nor had he laid labor in any sense upon the healed man. Nothing had been done to break the rest of the Sabbath; on the contrary, Jesus had given rest to a sufferer whose life had been a weariness for thirty-eight years! But this was the first ground of accumulated evidence of the same description, by which the enemies of God brought the Saviour to the cross! In the depths of their hearts they rebelled against the interference of God in the usual order of things on earth.

Jesus answered their accusations by the direct and definite statement, "My Father worketh hitherto and I work." This increased the storm against him. What! did this obnoxious Teacher not only break the Sabbath, but also say that God was his Father, thus making himself equal with God? What was it coming to? thought and said these blind, would-be guardians of the truth of God. Taking for granted, without any justifiable promises, that Jesus was in the wrong, and that they were contending for righteousness' sake, they saw everything through the color of their misconceptions. This man was not the Messiah, the Son promised (Isa. 9: 6); therefore his claim that God was his Father was blasphemy, and his command to the healed man to carry his bed or rug, was a scandal, and went against all Pharisaical ideas of the sanctity of the Sabbath. Thus they blinded themselves. The angels had borne witness to Jesus at his birth; a voice from heaven when he was baptized had declared him to be God's beloved Son; devils which had been cast out had declared him to be the Son of God; but the Pharisees persisted in ignoring all this testimony; they would not see in him the Son of God.

As the Eternal Son of the Eternal Father, Jesus did everything for eternity, and under the guidance of the Father which dwelt in him (John 10: 14). He spoke on this occasion words which found no entrance into the hearts of those to whom they were spoken, though of infinite value to all who believe in him; he was speaking for the future. Eternity is in every word of God: once spoken it can never cease to be (John 12 : 49, 50; Luke 21 : 33). He answered and said unto them, "Verily, verily, I say unto you, The Son can do nothing of himself, but what he seeth the Father do: for what things soever he doeth, these doeth the Son likewise." This is almost repeated (ver. 30), "I can of mine own self do nothing." God was his Father, but Jesus was truly Man; as dependent on his Father, as really empty of any power in his human nature to do divine things, or to speak divine words, as any of us are. He having emptied himself (Phil. 2 : 7, R. V.), depended absolutely and always on the Father which dwelt in him for every word he spoke (John 14 : 10).

"For the Father loveth the Son and showeth him all things that himself doeth." How the Son of God, who was in the beginning with God, had so emptied himself as to need in his human life and nature to learn of his Father the things which he did, must indeed remain a mystery. That it was so the Bible tells us. Let us believe and adore, lest we be tempted, like the Pharisees, to doubt and criticise the Lord whom it is our privilege to obey. "And he will show him greater things than these that ye may marvel. For as the Father raiseth up the dead and quickeneth them, so the Son also quickeneth whom he will. For the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment unto the Son, that all men should honor the Son even as they honor the Father. He that honoreth not the Son honoreth not the Father which hath sent him." Perhaps the absolute oneness and equality of the Eternal Father and Eternal Son are nowhere more fully shown than in this important Scripture.

And now our Lord begins to show that there is a spiritual and a physical resurrection, and that he is Lord of both. For spirit, soul and body his declaration of himself to Martha holds good: "I am the Resurrection and the Life" (John 11 : 25). In the first place the spiritual: "Verily, verily I say unto you"—the preface which our Lord always used for the most important utterance—"He that heareth my Word, and believeth him that sent me hath eternal life, and cometh not into judgment, but hath passed from death unto life" (R. V.).

"JESUS SAITH UNTO HIM, RISE, TAKE UP THY BED AND WALK"

LESSON POINTS

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers

ONE of the most explicit and emphatic statements we have of Christ's divine nature, is made in the verses to be considered this week. It is the great mystery of the ages, and even after a careful study of Christ's statement, it remains a mystery. But he probably told us in these words all about it that it is possible for human nature to understand. He certainly told us all that it is necessary for us to understand. The discourse was occasioned by the reproach which the Jews brought against Christ, for relaxing the law of the Sabbath. Their stupid literalism blinded them to the glory of the miracle he had wrought on the paralytic and seized on a technical breaking of the law. There was no doubt at all about the law being on the statute book, nor of the fact that the healed man, in obeying Christ, broke the law. In defence of himself Christ claimed a power and an authority which, in the eyes of the Jews, aggravated his offence. His words implied that he was in a peculiar manner the Son of God. This, according to their view was blasphemy: so Christ proceeded to show them in what sense he was the Son of God. He declared that his purposes and conduct were identical with God's; that a perfect understanding based on love existed between them; that God had given to him the power to represent him and manifest him to the world: and that he was entitled to the honor and reverence men should pay to God. Then with a solemn "Verily, Verily," he declares his power to give life and to give it so that not even death shall take it away. Further, he not only possessed this divine attribute, but he holds the divine commission of Judge and will exercise it through the power committed to him.

My Father worketh, hitherto. This truth needs to be reiterated in these days. Some people seem to imagine that natural law does everything; that God started the world and left it to itself, as a man winds up a clock. A little boy, who accompanied his father on a drive, told his mother, on his return, that he had driven all the way. "How dare you trust that child to drive?" she asked her husband afterwards. "Oh, it was safe," he said, "I had hold of the reins all the time."

Passed from death unto life. A clergyman, needing rest and perfect quiet, went for a few weeks to a remote village. At the house where he stayed, there was a ten-year-old boy who worked on a farm. He toiled from early morning until night, day after day, knowing nothing of life, and having not the remotest idea of a city, or of literature. He had never been to school, did not know his letters, and had scarcely ever had a book in his hand. To all intelligent life he was dead. But the clergyman saw in him mental power which might be developed. He persuaded the boy's father, a dull man, to let him take the boy back to his city home with him. He sent him to school, and soon the boy began to learn with avidity. The clergyman had not been mistaken about his possessing mental power. Once aroused, he studied hard. He devoured books of travel, science and history, and his memory held fast what he read. A few years later, paying a visit to his boyhood home, he realized what his life as a boy had been. The change was like a new world, like passing from death to life. So it is with the spirit. Conversion opens up a new world that unconverted people know nothing of "because it is spiritually discerned."

The Son quickeneth. Christ had just shown what he could do. The paralytic lying by the pool, so helpless that when the water stirred he had no power to step in, at his command, rose, rolled up the mattress on which he was lying and walked away, well. To the poor victim of sin who feels that he has not the power to quit, Christ gives strength now. Only, like the paralytic, he must confess that he is willing. A man was looking for the doctor and went to his house, but he was not at home. "Where is he?" he asked of the doctor's little boy who was playing in the yard. "Do you know where he has gone? I will go and find him if you know where he is." The child shook his head. "I don't know where he is," he said. "You had better look where there are sick people. That's where he is. He is helping somebody, somewhere." What a lovely testimony! It can be said of Christ with still greater confidence.

Because he is the Son of Man. There could be no better reason for investing him with the authority of Judge. He knew by experience what human nature was. He was representative, and men of all walks of life have drawn inspiration from his life. An old legend relates that Christ stood before a fire that had been kindled on the open street. The light of the fire threw his shadow on a vacant wall. His beloved disciple took a piece of charcoal and sketched on the wall the outline of the shadow. The next day as people passed, one and another stopped to look at the sketch. A fruit-vender who looked at it, said it was the image of a fruit-vender, and pointed to the stooping shoulders as the sign of one used to bear a burden. A sandal-maker said the attitude of the figure indicated a man of his trade. A member of the Sanhedrim said the sketch represented a philosopher. One man stayed looking at it lovingly and a long time, and the people around saw his face and figure change till they resembled the sketch, and they said it must be his portrait. The Apostle Paul has the same thought. He says those who love him are "changed into the same image."

PORTO RICO'S CRYING NEED

Sunday Schools, Teachers and Testaments Urgently Demanded—Beginning Gospel Work—A Free Gospel Under a Free Flag

FROM OUR Y. M. C. A. CORRESPONDENT

THE entire island is ripe for a systematic evangelical work. The priesthood have lost their hold on intelligent natives. So far, very little has been done to occupy the field at Ponce. The Episcopal church building is occupied on each Sunday morning, and the post chaplain conducts a service for English-speaking people. In the interior is an absolute dearth of evangelical effort, except at Arecibo, where Chaplain Phillips, of the 6th U. S. V. has done some private work among the natives, and claims some trophies for Christ and his kingdom.

Private soldiers have given their testimony for the truth in a few instances, but no consecutive and well-organized effort has been put forth since our troops took possession of Porto Rico, and raised Old Glory above its palaces and public buildings.

At San Juan there are signs of improvement. A humble company of people, mostly from the British West Indies, have gathered about Student G. S. Swenson, of Augusta College and Theological Seminary of Rock Island, Illinois, and on December 4th, 1898, began public worship in Mr. Brown's parlor, at 47 Sol street. On December 21st they formed a society called "The Christian Missionary Alliance." The society now numbers thirty-eight—all poor people.

Mr. Swenson acts as the pastor of this little flock, some of whom have received the truth in Antigua, through missionaries of the Christian Alliance, of New York. The little room where services are held is crowded each time with both English-speaking and Porto Rican people. I had the pleasure of preaching the Christmas sermon to them, and the street in front of the building was thronged. Andrew McKim, of the American Bible Society, has helped them by speaking in Spanish. Mr. Swenson began a Sunday School with three Porto Rican young men on New Year's Day, 1899.

The committee of the new organization—the Colonial Christian Association—prepared in true American style for their first service. The use of the theatre was secured. Hand-bills were scattered, printed in Spanish and English, giving the names of speakers and singers. A choir was formed by Mrs. Hanna, wife of U. S. Consul Hanna, and all arrangements were made for an orderly meeting. But the ecclesiastical authorities had heard something of it, and were in great agitation. The highest functionary hurried to the Alcalde, and demanded that the doors of the theatre be shut against these "heretics who are trying to change the established order of things ecclesiastical." His Honor, fearful of the possible consequences of disobeying the behests of his dean, sent word to the committee that the theatre, which is a public building under the control of the city authorities, must not be used. But man proposes and God disposes. Preacher and committee, with choir, found the building ready and open at the hour announced, filled with people. Student Swenson, who was anxious to have matters in readiness for service, had gone early to the place, and, being in ignorance of the official edict, demanded admittance, and the trembling janitor hastened to obey. We began the service with the grand Coronation hymn, "All Hail the Power of Jesus' Name," in a place that had never before echoed with sacred song. Your correspondent preached a New Year's sermon from Philippians 3: 12–14: "Forgetting the past"—urging the people to put aside prejudice and open their hearts to receive the Spirit of Christ, and explained to the Porto Ricans that the theatres in North America are frequently used for public religious services.

Don Rapael Lopez Landron made an earnest address in Spanish. He is a prominent advocate, and the priest had visited him and forbidden him to take part. One of the singers had also been warned to stay away from the service.

Gen. Guy V. Henry, the Commanding General of the island, was also visited by certain ecclesiastics, who protested against meetings which, they claimed, would be inimical to their interests, but were told that our flag gave the utmost freedom to all forms of religious belief, and advised not to meddle with the affairs of Christians who desired to worship God in their own way.

The greatest need now is a thorough system of Sunday Schools throughout the island. Let our American Sunday School Boards send down men and women who can speak the language and doors will be opened in every city, town and hamlet. Through these schools the Gospel can be carried to the adults, and each school be made a nucleus for future church organization, just as our Western States have been occupied and developed through the same agencies. Next Sunday we hope to gather a large number of children in the theatre at San Juan, and begin by teaching them to sing Gospel Hymns. I take this means of asking any of your readers who desire to help this movement to send to me illuminated picture lesson rolls and other object lessons of a religious kind, or lesson leaves in the Spanish language. If addressed to F. L. Smith, care Young Men's Christian Association, San Juan, P. R., they will reach the friends in charge of the Sunday School.

Already a demand has arisen for Bibles in the Spanish and English language and you will be doing a great service to natives by sending a full supply of Testaments and booklets printed in parallel columns. Many Porto Ricans, who might object to receiving a tract or religious booklet, will be so anxious to learn our language that they will eagerly read the Testament and thus imbibe the pure Gospel.

God always has his way prepared for his work, and not only the way, but the place. Under Spanish rule, the people were demoralized by public lotteries, and hundreds of men made a livelihood by selling lottery tickets throughout the island. With the raising of our flag, public gambling received its death-blow and the very commodious building which has heretofore been the scene of public lottery drawings, now bids fair to become the headquarters for aggressive Christian effort in Porto Rico. The building is in the very centre of San Juan, near the post office and army headquarters, and will accommodate, upon the ground floor, the coffee-house outfit which we expect to instal very soon, leaving the rest of the rooms to be occupied by kindred societies, or sublet to reduce the rental charge. Our soldiers will welcome the establishment of an Army Y. M. C. A., with coffee-house, reading, writing and amusement rooms. At present they have no place for recreation, and are tempted to frequent the scores of cafes, and always with the accompaniment of liquor. Many of our soldier lads will be saved from intemperance by the institution of a proper place to secure American cooked food and good American-made coffee, without liquor and beer. In addition to this, religious services and Bible classes will be held for their benefit, and a systematic effort made to meet their moral and spiritual needs. The heartiest co-operation has been offered by Maj.-General Guy V. Henry, who commands the island.

A largely attended service was held at the general hospital on the first Sunday in the new year, under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association. The large court was well seated with chairs, a good choir of lady nurses and stewards led the singing, and the men gave earnest attention to the Gospel message. Nearly one hundred hands went up requesting prayers and determining to lead new lives in 1899. Hospital Steward McElroy, of Brooklyn, sang a solo, and is to have charge of the choir and committee at the hospital. I have never spoken to a more appreciative audience anywhere.

Regular services will be held each Sunday afternoon, hereafter. The Y. M. C. A. work will be organized in the military districts on the island after the San Juan headquarters are in good working order, and we are counting upon the co-operation of your good readers to make the coffee-house a great success in developing the religious life of our soldier boys. We crave the united prayers of your people in behalf of this important work.

CHRISTIAN WORKERS AT INGHOK, CHINA

Enterprise in the New Colonies

American newspapers have already been established in Cuba and the Philippines. The first numbers of The Havana Advertiser, of which a bright young American, Mr. George E. Bryson, is founder and editor, shows abundant evidence of enterprise and stability, and is a significant illustration of the talent which recognizes and grasps an opportunity to do real public service. The paper has been welcomed by all classes, and especially by the business men of Havana, who have had to be satisfied heretofore with Spanish journals, in whose columns nothing good was ever said of Americans.

From Manila, in the Philippines, we have The American Soldier, also a pioneer publication. It is essentially a soldiers' paper, and doubtless has a large interest for the "boys in blue" who have served in the new colonies, or are now doing faithful service there.

C. E. SOCIETY BANNER AT INGHOK, FOOCHOW

ary at Foochow. Among the Society banners none was more admired than the one reproduced here—that of the Society of Inghok City. The church at that place, which had never been satisfactory, has been sold and the members, who only rented it, ordered to vacate. Efforts are being made to erect in its stead a church in memory of the late Rev. S. F. Woodin, of the American Board, who was a pioneer in that region and had charge of the work for over thirty years.

The C. E. Society, as their offering wish to give this banner to the largest subscriber. The banner is most exquisitely embroidered on crimson silk—the work of one of the members of the Society, an embroiderer by trade. It was a work of love, and occupied his spare time often until late in the night, for many months. The banner is about three feet wide by five feet long, and is certainly a work of art and well worth an effort by any Society in America to possess.

The work in that district is in charge of Rev. Mr. Goddard. He writes that his "workers are second to none in China." They certainly are a bright set of men. The amount of money asked for ($500) is modest enough for a church, and especially one to perpetuate the memory of a faithful missionary.

The Indestructible Word

It is related that the famous Dr. Buchanan was dining with a literary party at the house of the father of Sir Ralph Abercrombie, in London, when a gentleman in the company put this question: "If every copy of the New Testament had been destroyed at the end of the third century"—(for it was then that Diocletian was engaged in his effort to extinguish the book)—"whether it could have been recovered again from the extracts made from it in the works of the fathers of the second and third centuries?" This question startled the company, but none could answer it.

Two months afterwards, Dr. Buchanan called on Lord Hales, the Scotch judge, who pointed to a table covered with books and papers, and said, "Look at these: you remember the question about the fathers and the New Testament which was put by one of the company at Mr. Abercrombie's, about two months ago?" Dr. Buchanan said he remembered it well. "That question aroused my curiosity," said the judge, "and as I knew I possessed all the extant fathers of the second and third centuries, I commenced the search, and, up to this present time, I have found the entire New Testament, all but eleven verses." What a grand demonstration of the faith, life, devotion of these believers! The infallible Word was their daily "bread of life." Their prayers, homilies, and commentaries were full of the precious truths of the Gospel.

The Magnificent Gift

WITHIN a few days the world has been startled with the donation of $250,000 by Mr. Andrew Carnegie, for the building of a library at Washington, D.C. A little incident connecting this editorial room with that transaction may be interesting. The editor of this paper was on the day of the above donation standing in one of the rooms of the White House. Mr. Warner, the Vice-President of the Washington library, entered. The two men were talking when Mr. Carnegie came in. The editor was gladly surprised to see him. The two had not met since they parted on the New York wharf after a transatlantic voyage. After a few moments of conversation the editor of this paper took Mr. Carnegie across the room and introduced him to Mr. Warner. The conversation naturally took up the subject of libraries because Mr. Carnegie is known everywhere as the builder of such institutions. Within one hour he made the donation of $250,000. No appointment had been made. The noble deed was done without any premeditation. Washington will have the library and the editor of this paper is delighted that he had anything to do with the introduction that resulted in this wonderful benefaction.

Our Religious Public Men

THESE must be difficult times for those who are convinced that the world is going to the bad, and that its rulers have united in despising the Lord of Glory. The addresses of our public men are sufficient to send a thrill of delight to every devout heart. If the war has brought other revelations, so has it revealed the fact that we are at bottom a Christian people. When before in the world's history were the speeches of Senators as religious, or more so, than many sermons; and their deliberations as devout as a Presbyterian General Assembly? When before were grave, current questions discussed with such allusions to "Providence," with such religious prophecies of the future of the nations, with such Biblical quotations and examples, and with such frequent use of the Christian appeal, as "He died to make men holy; let us die to make men free"? All this is very significant. It betokens a deep and pervasive substratum of religiousness. Our public men are far from perfect—if this were not the case they would be very far from representing their constituents!—they may belong to denominations differing from ours, or to none, but every candid person must admit that, generally speaking, they are truth-seeking, substantially Christian; and some of us, at least, rejoice in the prospect that fact warrants. We hear much about the perils and difficulties confronting us. No wise person would underestimate them, but we may feel very sure that so long as the Republic has such men to guide both parties, men who look to Him who teacheth the Senators wisdom; men who expect to account at the Judgment for their words and their influence; it is still in its progressive age, and far, far from the dismal end some foretell. Nations do not go to ruin with the banner of the Cross waving above them, with songs filling the valleys, and with Scriptures echoing from the mountains, the battle hymn of the Republic stirring every soul, and ours will not. With such men to lead us, and that God who heareth the prayers that it is our duty to offer for our land, our future is safe.

Why? Why?

THE toughest thing the officiating clergyman at the obsequies of an eminently good man who expires in mid-life has to do, is to explain the Providence. Why not wait until he was worn out with old age? Why, after the batteries had been loaded for a new campaign and were about to be unlimbered, must a gunner drop. Why should he be taken before this Austerlitz, this Sedan, this Waterloo between Infidelity and Christianity is undisputably settled in behalf of Him who is the rider on the white horse? Why should a mounted captain of the Lord's host be slain, while the feet of many weak Christians are by terror being shaken out of the stirrups? Why should this man die, when to rally the courage of the Christian Church we want more plumed warriors at the front? It is as though Blucher had been slain while coming up at nightfall with reinforcements. It is as though Garnet Wolseley had fallen half way between Alexandria and Telel-Keber. How demoralizing, to have the riderless horse of a chieftain careering and snorting across the battle-plain.

The Show-Windows

WHETHER God or Satan shall have complete possession of these cities is the question of the hour. Never so many churches. Never so many reformatory institutions. Never so many good men and women. Never so hopeful a prospect. But do not think that righteousness will triumph without many rebuffs and terrific and long-continued struggle. Take the one fact that many of the streets of our cities have become depraved picture galleries, by reason of the unclean figures represented in show-windows and on board fences. Many of the theatres and opera houses are, by mode of street advertisement, practicing an indecency that ought long ago to have met the interdict of city authorities. Twenty-five years ago such pictures would not have been allowed. The manager who ordered them, and the bill-poster who carried them and the merchant who allowed them in his show window would have been hauled up in police court to answer. Would you allow in your parlors and in the presence of your family on the part of any one such a lack of apparel? No! Then why allow it in the presence of the whole city?

I denounce this wholesale immorality of show-windows of our American cities, as an appaling education in the wrong direction. Let the merchants forbid such insult to public virtue hanging in their windows. Let the mayors of these cities walk through the streets and see the disgraceful spectacle. Here is a practical reform that I demand in the name of God and of all decent citizens. If these pictures that present the actors and actresses unapparreled are intended as specimens of the retormed American theatres, then they are being reformed into a Sodom. In Southern Europe the immoral pictures of Herculaneum and Pompeii, are kept under lock and key as specimens of a polluted age, to be looked at by severe antiquarians. But our American cities put the pictorial indecencies in show-windows, on board fences and bulletin boards, for men and women and children to look at as they go to church or school or social call or business. The stupendous nuisance is getting to be unbearable. While there never has been an age since the world stood, in which the agencies for good were so potential as now, there never was an age in which the forces of evil were so unblushing and blatant.

Give a child excessive meat diet, and it will grow up sensual, and catechism three times a day and sixty grains in a dose won't prevent it. Talk much in your child's presence about the fashions, and it will be fond of dress, notwithstanding all your lectures on humility. Fill your house with gossip and your children will tattle. Culture them as much as you will, but give them plenty of money to spend and they will go to destruction.

When David was fleeing through the wilderness, pursued by his own son, he was being prepared to become the sweetest singer in all Israel. The pit and the dungeon were the best schools at which Joseph was graduated. The hurricane that upset the tent and killed Job's children prepared the man of Uz to write the magnificent poem that has astounded the ages. There is no way to get the wheat of the straw but to thresh it. There is no way to purify the gold but to melt it.

People have been trying to write histories of the tunes and of the hymns. They cannot do it. The history of "Ariel," of "Colchester," of "Dundee," of "Duke Street," of "Coronation." Why, it would be the history of the Church of God, with all its joys and sorrows and triumphs! They have been the rounds of the ladder on which souls have mounted into heaven. They have been the chariots that halted not until they stopped at the gate of the Eternal City.

The most of religious work needs swift feet. If it is not done speedily it will never be done. Yonder is a heart breaking. Now is the time to say a healing word. Go next week with you balsam and it will not touch the case. A man yonder came under your influence and you might have captured him for God. You will never have another chance at him for God. To-morrow another man will be under your influence. You will have but one opportunity of saving him.

JOURNALIST AND LIBRARIAN

DEATH has removed from participation in national activities a figure which for nearly forty years has been prominent in public affairs. John Russell Young was one of those typical Americans, whose keen interest in current events and power of vigorous expression bring them in touch with the millions of their fellow-countrymen. He was a born journalist, to whom the events of the day were full of meaning and significance. Even as a school-boy in the New Orleans high school, he edited a journal issued by the pupils, which he filled with the news most interesting to his readers. In the troubles of 1861, he was one of the first journalists to go to the front, and, throughout the war, his pen was one of the most brilliant and trenchant in the scene of strife. Afterwards, he drifted to New York, where on the Tribune and the Herald his articles exerted a potent influence in shaping public opinion. In 1877, Gen. Grant invited him to accompany him on his round-the-world tour, which gave him the material for his two descriptive volumes of travel. Later, at Gen. Grant's suggestion, he was appointed minister to China. The same post was offered to him subsequently under the Harrison administration, but Mr. Young held diplomatic honors poor compensation for exile from the country he loved, and he declined the offer. Probably the most congenial office that could be offered to him, was that which President McKinley tendered him in June, 1897, when he appointed him Librarian of Congress. The great national library was about to have a home worthy of it, in the magnificent building just completed. Mr. Young willingly accepted the office, placed expert librarians in charge of the various departments, and made plans for the development of the Library on a scale appropriate to its national character. Nearly a million volumes had to be arranged and made accessible to legislators and students. Mr. Young's executive ability was called into full activity in this work, and it is feared that it proved too severe a strain for his over-wrought constitution. His death at the age of fifty-eight causes profound sorrow to a host of friends who hoped for many more years of his genial companionship. It is difficult to think of this man, whose interest in the events of his time was so keen, passing so completely out of all participation in public life, but the sensation is a very old one and has oppressed men of other times:

The dead know not anything, neither have they a reward. As well their love as their hatred is now perished, neither have they any more a portion forever in anything that is done under the sun (Eccles. 9: 5, 6, R.V.).

Stopping a Stampede

The influence of cavalry training on horses was conclusively demonstrated recently, at San Antonio, Tex. A local journal says that eight hundred horses broke out of a corral and went off at full speed. Two men made an heroic effort to head them off, but were brushed aside and narrowly escaped losing their lives. About half the horses, however, belonged to the First Texas Cavalry, and the bugler was one of the men who saw the tumultuous flight. He made a rush for his bugle and sounded a call. Instantly it could be seen which of the horses had received military training. In obedience to the call, the old chargers formed in line and turned at right angles. He sounded "halt!" and the chargers came to a standstill. The other horses, heedless of the bugle-call, continued their mad career. Some were cut to pieces by a train, others died by collision with telegraph poles and other obstacles. Thirty, in all, were killed before their flight came to an end. Of the chargers none were hurt. The time is coming when men will look back on their lives and see how closely they resembled this stampede. Those whose souls were delivered from harm were they who heeded the warnings of God's Word.

I will instruct thee and teach thee in the way which thou shalt go. Be ye not as the horse and the mule which have no understanding (Ps. 32: 8, 9).

A Memorial Door-plate

A student interested in the early history of New York sends to a daily journal a statement of a discovery he recently made which surprised him. He began an exploration of the section of the city which old New Yorkers still speak of as Greenwich Village. In tracing the streets and trying to form a mental picture of the region as it used to be before the city absorbed it, he noticed that the older houses still had on their doors the brass door-plates which were once seen on the better class of houses. Many of them bore the names of families famous in the city's history, and, concluding that the houses were occupied by representatives of these families, he promised himself the pleasure of gleaning from them interesting facts relating to the past. To his surprise, however, he found in several instances that there was no one living in the house of the name which was on the door-plate. From one resident to whom he applied for an explanation, he learned that the original owners had made it a condition of the sale of their houses that the door-plates should never be removed. They wished their names to be identified with the houses as long as the houses stood. Their wish is gratified, but all that the door-plate now indicates is that a person of the name it bears once lived there. Unhappily there are some churches which bear the name of Christ, but are in like condition, and there were such churches even in Apostolic days.

I know thy works, that thou hast a name that thou livest and art dead (Rev. 3:1).

A Short-lived City

The story of a city in California whose existence was phenomenally short, is told by a correspondent of the New York Sun. It was in 1866 that gold was found at Excelsior, and at once the boom started. During the next six months more than two hundred buildings, each worth fifteen hundred dollars, were erected, besides banks, hotels and public buildings, each costing several thousands. Then suddenly the collapse came. A report issued to the shareholders of the principal mine declared that by no known process could gold be extracted from the ore, and, in short, the mine was a failure. The city was promptly deserted, so hurriedly in some instances that the furniture was left in the houses and the stocks in the stores. The city is said to be now a heap of ruins. Only a few houses still stand. One of them, a substantial one, that cost four thousand dollars in 1867, was sold to the present owner for twenty-five dollars. There is no difficulty in understanding the cause of the city's collapse. The people were drawn there by the hope of getting gold, and being disappointed, they left. Such disappointment can never come to those who enter the city of God. They will go there because they love righteousness and they will be satisfied.

As we have heard, so have we seen in the city of the Lord of Hosts, in the city of our God: God will establish it forever (Psa. 48: 8).

Crazed by Grief

A woman was found wandering in a cemetery at Newtown, N. Y., at midnight recently by the police. She would give no account of herself, but was evidently deranged. From papers found in her pockets, her husband was traced, and he was taken to the station house. He said that his wife's distress was due to the death of their boy. He had been ill for some time, and had been taken to a hospital. There an operation had been suggested, but as it was admitted to be dangerous, the consent of the parents was demanded before the operation was performed. He had opposed it, but the mother advocated it and urged it so earnestly that he yielded. The boy died under the knife, and the mother reproached herself with causing his death. She had brooded over it until her mind became unbalanced. Probably her disposition was morbid, otherwise she would have consoled herself with the purity of her motive, and would not have reproached herself with her son's death. There is reason to fear that some parents will not have that consolation, when they find that their children have lost their souls through their negligence or bad example, starting them on the downward path.

I will judge his house for ever for the iniquity which he knoweth; because his sons made themselves vile, and he restrained them not (I. Samuel 3: 13).

THE NEW CONGRESSIONAL LIBRARY AT WASHINGTON, D. C.

Hungarian Slaves

Inquiries as to the cause of a revolt in Hungary, which has now led to the imprisonment of the leaders, have disclosed an astonishing social system of oppression. It appears that the owners of the land in some districts of Hungary retain the privileges, that they call rights, which have descended to them from feudal times. One of these is that every man living in the district shall work for them without pay for fifty days in every year. Against these conditions there has been an unsuccessful revolt. The leader, Stephen Varkonyl, has been tried for high treason in inciting his brethren to resist oppression. He has been convicted, but in consideration of the provocation he had, he has been let off with the mild sentence of one year's imprisonment. It is not surprising that the peasants rebelled against such oppression. No man likes to work without pay, and yet how many there are who willingly serve Satan, though they know that in that service the only pay is eternal death.

THE LATE JOHN RUSSELL YOUNG

The wages of sin is death; but the gift of God is eternal life (Rom. 6: 23).

The $30,000 Carnation

Florists in our large cities are discussing the almost unprecedented price for which the Lawson carnation plant was sold a few days ago. It was known that a florist in Chicago had offered six thousand dollars for it, but everyone was surprised to hear that so large a sum as thirty thousand dollars had been offered and accepted. There are no cuttings, except those in the possession of the vender. It was raised and developed in Boston, Mass., and its purchaser belongs to that city. Its peculiarities are the size of its blossoms, which are four and a half inches; its remarkable delicacy of coloring; and the fact that, as the flower fades, the petals expand, instead of contracting, as carnations generally do. These traits put the plant in a class by itself and give it value in the eyes of connoisseurs. Two centuries ago similar prices were paid for rare varieties of tulips, but it seems almost incredible that in these days any plant can be really worth so much money. The newspapers rightly describe it as a craze, and the name will seem still more appropriate in the day when all values are tested in the light of eternity.

The grass withereth and the flower falleth; but the word of the Lord abideth forever (I. Peter 1:24, R. V.).

Samoan Complications

The rival claimants for the crown in the island of Samoa in the South Pacific, have carried their contention to a point at which grave international difficulties are threatened. The islands are under the joint protection of the United States, Great Britain and Germany. Since 1889, when a conference of the three powers settled existing difficulties, King Malietoa Laupepa has reigned in comparative peace. His rival, Tamasese, has not resisted the arrangement which excluded him from power. But since Malietoa's death, in August last, he has again pressed his claims. His opponents are Mataafa, who is popular with the warriors and the people; and Malietoa Tanus, who has the support of the American and British Consuls. Under the treaty of 1889, all questions in the islands are to be decided by a Chief Justice, who is appointed by the three protecting powers. Mr. Chambers, who holds that office, is an American. He gave his decision in favor of Malietoa Tanus. The German Consul, who had espoused the cause of Mataafa, protested against the decision and attempted to oust Chief Justice Chambers from his court. The American and British Consuls resisted and summarily ejected the German Consul and his protege from the building. The dispute will now be referred to the Governments at Washington, London and Berlin, with whom it will rest to decide who shall reign in Samoa. It may be hoped that in settling the question they will not be guided by international jealousy, but by that wisdom which comes from above.

By me kings reign and princes decree justice (Prov. 8: 15).

WINNING HAWAII.... ....FOR CHRIST

The Gospel Work of the North Pacific Missionary Institute — Seventy-seven Years of Consecrated Effort on the Islands

WHEN the first missionaries of the American Board landed in Hawaii in 1820, there were very few countries open to missionary effort. The vast populations of India under English rule attracted the first missionary workers of England and the United States. When the islands of the Pacific, and the cruel rites of heathenism among their teeming tribes, were made known to the world by the first voyages of discovery, Christian people were interested in their needs.

In the United States this interest was intensified by the story of Obookioh (Opukahaia), a Sandwich Islands youth found on the doorstep of one of Yale College buildings, weeping with eager desire for the advantages of Christian education. A boarding-school for such youths was established in Cornwall, Conn., in 1817; and when these had been under training for a few years, a mission to the Sandwich Islands was organized. Those who were selected for this mission were constituted a church of seventeen members, with appropriate services of recognition, in Park Street Church, Boston; and Oct. 23, 1819, the mission band embarked on the brig Thaddeus, for the long voyage around Cape Horn to the far-off islands of Hawaii. They reached Kedakekua Bay, April, 1820, and found to their amazement that God had as wonderfully opened the way for their missionary work as he had providentially gathered together the band of missionary workers: two young graduates of Andover Theological Seminary, a Christian physician, farmer, mechanic, teacher and printer, with their wives and four Hawaiian youths. The old system of idolatry had been abolished, and the people were waiting for the introduction of the Gospel of redemption.

Permission was secured for the settlement of the members of the mission band at different localities in the group of islands. Slowly the work of the Hawaiian Mission made progress. Heathenism was abandoned. Christian schools and churches were established, at first under the direct care of the American missionaries. Then after education had become general and teachers proved their fitness for leadership, they were appointed pastors of the Hawaiian churches.

This process of evangelization and Christianization had gone on for nearly twenty years when the wonderful revivals in the churches of the United States brought a great many young men into the Christian ministry, and so many candidates for the foreign field, for whom few countries were open, that in 1840 as many as eighty-six missionaries of the American Board were stationed at various points in the group. There had been, also, a great revival at the islands—1837–1839—and multitudes were brought into the Hawaiian churches. They needed pastoral care and oversight, and to meet the increasing need of native pastors, different missionaries were especially appointed to give training and instruction to selected young men. Rev. W. D. Alexander, formerly a teacher, in the Lahainaluna Seminary, had taught systematic and pastoral theology to the students, and on removing to Wailuku, taught here a theological class. But the work was too much for the infirmities of increasing years to maintain; and the effort was begun to establish a theological seminary at Honolulu. Appeal was made through the American Board for suitably qualified ministers to constitute a faculty of instruction, but with no better success than when the Government, years before, had invited lawyers from the States to come to the islands and inaugurate a system of jurisprudence.

In 1870, the people of Honolulu bought for the use of the Hawaiian Board, buildings centrally located, that have been used as the U. S. Marine Hospital. Some of the old missionaries were appointed instructors. But the work was too arduous for men of their advanced age. In 1877, the A. B. C. F. M. appointed Rev. C. M. Hyde, D.D., on his leaving the pastorate of the Centre Church, Haverhill, Mass., to take charge of this work, and reorganize it under the name of the North Pacific Missionary Institute, as a training school for Hawaiian pastors and missionaries. It was supposed that young men from the field of the Moravian Mission might also be brought to Honolulu for a few years' training and Christian surroundings; but the obstacles to such an enlargement of the work were found to be insuperable, and the plan was adopted, now in successful operation, of establishing a training school in the field, on the island of Kusaie for the pastors to be placed over the churches of the Gilbert and Marshall Islands.

Dr. Hyde began his work October, 1877, with five young Hawaiians, whom he found awaiting his arrival. For the first few months he had some assistance from two of the old missionaries of the Board residing in Honolulu, and from Rev. H. H. Parker, pastor of the (Hawaiian) Kawaiahao Church. But the others soon relinquished the work, leaving Rev. Mr. Parker as the only assistant and associate with Dr. Hyde. A new class, averaging ten in number, has every year entered from the fifty-seven Hawaiian Churches, examined and approved by the Island Association, and at one time there was a total of twenty-two students connected with the Institute. The usual number has been twelve, with the addition last year of one Portuguese and three Chinese.

In the progress of events, notably the discontinuance of schools in the Hawaiian language, and the increased facilities for education in English, the demand has become imperative for additional instruction, especially in preparing the young men for the recent methods of Christian institutional work in evangelistic meetings, Sunday School and Y. M. C. A. work, and Young People's Societies of Christian Endeavor. With the hope of securing some assistant and associate aptly qualified to take charge of this department of the work, Dr. Hyde relinquished the salary, in order that the American Board could have the opportunity of appointing some one for this object, without any added burden on the treasury of the Board. In 1895, Rev. John Leadingham, who had been connected with the Slavic Department of the Oberlin Theological Seminary, was appointed by the Board as one of the Faculty of the Institute. Rev. O. H. Gulick, also, born at the islands, and well versed in the Hawaiian language, a son of Rev. John Gulick, of the Sandwich Islands Mission, who had been released from the Japan missions where he had been stationed at Kumamolu, and appointed resident superintendent of mission work among the 25,000 Japanese immigrant laborers on the sugar plantations of Hawaii, was also made a member of the Faculty of Instruction.

Dr. Hyde's health has recently failed, and he has been unable to attend to his duties in the Institute, though still continuing his literary work and other labors. The other members of the faculty, however, are carrying on the work of the Institute. With the new importance, commercially and politically, given to Hawaii by its annexation to the United States, added interest is attached to the work of the Institute.

MORAL PERILS IN CUBA

MR. E. H. CHAPIN, now conducting Y. M. C. A. operations in Cuba, has sent another interesting letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in which he describes the situation at the military camp at Marianao. He writes:

CAMP HAVANA, Cuba, Jan. 11, 1899.

It was an experience to have also rounded the docks of the transport [illegible] and to see the strongest fortress in Cuba. We entered the [illegible] harbor, Dec. 21, but were not allowed to land until Thursday. There were only two battalions of our regiment (the [illegible]) on this transport, the [illegible] on another transport. The men, all in heavy marching order, formed in line on the docks, [illegible] Spanish soldiers still garrisoned the city, and looked with wonder at the fine line of troops; but the Cubans, at the sight of an American army marching through the city, lost all control of themselves, and rent the air with shouts of "Viva los Americanos!"

It was a long, hard march and the men were glad to reach the camp grounds, which are situated about a mile from the little town of Marianao, on the cliffs overlooking the sea. It is a beautiful spot and commands a fine view of the country. In a few hours the men had pitched tents, and were trying to get supper. [illegible] ground and roughed it with the men. All my supplies, including large tents, writing materials, books, etc., were down at the docks. I had a little paper with me, and the men wanted to write home; so, one night, I went around to every tent, and left some paper and envelopes and spoke a cheering word to them. This little kindness greatly pleased them.

In a few days I got my tent and supplies up from the dock, and we put up the tent for service. Sunday morning, Dec. 18, we had, I believe, the first service held in an American army in Havana. Lumber was very scarce, and I had to make tables and benches out of anything; but we soon had the tent in good running condition, and a great number of letters were written daily. Expressions of gratitude were heard on every side from the soldiers.

The Y. M. C. A. work is hard here and we have many hardships to put up with, but it is needed more than ever before. The temptations in this tropical country are terrible. The men are becoming demoralized, and seem to take delight in plunging into the vilest of sins. I have witnessed sights that have made my blood run cold. It is a sad thing that the Cubans learn a great deal of profanity from our own men. E. H. CHAPIN,

Army Y.M.C.A. Secretary, 2d Illinois Vol.

For Youthful Travelers

There was opened in Boston, lately, the largest and most costly railroad station in the world. It covers an area of thirteen acres and [illegible]. Its main waiting-room is nearly 300 feet in length and is lighted by 1,200 electric lights. Opening from this waiting-room is a smaller room, perhaps forty by fifty feet, for women. In this room is a distinct novelty, and one that every juvenile traveler will appreciate, since it consists of a number of pretty oak cribs and beds that are dressed in snowy white, and a number of white-capped and white-aproned maids are in attendance. Mothers who are compelled to wait with tired and fretful babies will find this new provision for their comfort one that they will certainly be grateful for.

WAIFS OF "LITTLE ITALY"

A New Feature of Missionary Work in the Slums—A Haven for the Street Children

DRUNKENNESS and crime are on the increase among the children of the streets. Appreciation of these facts led Miss Anna C. Ruddy—whose beneficent work in "Little Italy" (as a certain district in up-town New York, is called), has more than once been mentioned in these pages—to search for a remedy, and to believe that it can only be found in the introduction and cultivation of the home life. The outcome of her conclusions has been a children's day home, something new in city evangelization, which promises much benefit to children of tenements.

The home is now in possession of attractive rooms at 424 E. 115th Street, where the children of Miss Ruddy's Sunday School, and of the neighborhood, irrespective of nationality, are welcomed out of school hours. There are games to play, a large library of juvenile books, a sand table, building blocks, and kindergarten work for the little ones. The beautiful play-room shown in the picture is an animated scene after three o'clock in the afternoon.

Older boys and girls are not forgotten. Sunday afternoons they are gathered in and enjoy the home atmosphere; some always staying to tea. Judging from the success of the day home, a dozen more could be started in as many blocks, and they would all be filled. School teachers especially are enthusiastic over the idea, knowing well what an enemy the street life is to progress at school.

A little, dark-eyed fellow sat in the corner of a cold, cheerless room, on a bitter winter night, trying to forget his troubles in the thrilling adventures described in a cheap book that had drifted into his possession. But it was bitterly cold, he was hungry, and he could not, as usual, lose himself in the story of deeds of daring. It occurred to him that he had been invited by one of the boys to go to the Mission Sunday School around the corner, where there was warmth, and where presents would be given out when Christmas came. He went, was welcomed; Christmas came, and he got a present—the first one that he had ever received in his life. Miss Ruddy took him into her heart, and he became a frequent guest at her home. He is now eighteen, and for months past has been teaching a class in a Lexington Avenue Sunday School, and has by his own thrift and industry saved enough money to go to boarding-school in February.

Another boy, "Jakey," was a typical Arab, the torment of the neighborhood; had been expelled from every school in Harlem, and his mischievous pranks were continually getting him into trouble. One day he went too far and was arrested. La Maestra (the mistress), was sent for, as she usually is on such occasions. The evidence was strong against him, and the judge was severe; but the teacher stood beside the now subdued and penitent "Jakey," and, putting her hand on his shoulder, asked that, instead of being sent to prison, he be given over to her. The judge looked from one to the other and relented. A school was found for the boy and a conduct card given him, which must be signed by his friend every day. It was arranged that he should come every afternoon and stay to tea. This he did for months until he went to work. He has worked steadily ever since, and bids fair to become a respectable member of society. Many other instances of the same character might be mentioned.

Any readers who may intimate a desire for further information concerning the work, Miss Ruddy will cheerfully answer.

IN MISS RUDDY'S PLAY-ROOM

A MUSICAL HOUR IN "LITTLE ITALY"

The Queen's Watchword

A maid of honor to Queen Victoria writes in an English journal of some interesting conversations with the Queen. In one of these, Her Majesty speaks of the influence left upon England by its great monarchs from Alfred to Elizabeth, and says:

I can hardly hope to leave such; yet under my rule the people who were counted by hundreds have grown to thousands, the thousands to millions; that has come about because, for the most part, my reign has been one of peace. My influence has ever been for peace. Only under a regime of peace can a people grow in those graces and virtues which it is the aim of our religion to inculcate. There is no reason why a nation devoted to peace should become weak and effeminate. The labors of men in their peaceful callings—in mines and quarries, on the seas, in furnaces and ironworks, building railways, and laying submarine and other cables, exploring and planting new colonies—all these labors are as arduous as those of the soldier, and they call out stronger and more enduring qualities. If it were in my power, I would have all ships, when they meet in the ocean, and when they touch at a port, say to each other, "Friend, the watchword is Peace."

His Mother's Face

"I will tell you," said a bearded man, "what made and kept my faith in prayer. It is a look that I used to see on my mother's face. I always knew by that look just where my mother had been, and what she had been doing. When I was very little, and could not be released from her apron strings, I had been with her and watched. There was a tiny, quiet room off from her chamber where she used to say her prayers. During the day, if something happened to vex her—and there were many things to try her temper and her spirit—she would shut her lips tight, and, as soon as possible, steal into that room and pray. When I grew older, and came to be a man, I used to watch for my mother when she came out of that closet. Her face would be always full of sweet quietness and peace."

Polly's Garden

Polly is beginning to think about what she shall plant in her garden. She is only seven, but she had a garden last year and means to renew the experiment. Mamma's small back yard (Polly lives in the city) was not improved in appearance, "But then," says mamma, "Polly was. Hoeing and raking made her rosy. She knows, too, a great deal more about bursting seeds and budding plants than she could have learned any other way."

Chicago's Schools

Chicago has found it necessary to make retrenchments in public school appropriations, and hopes which have been cherished by friends of kindergarten extension, it seems, are not to be fulfilled. Women's Clubs and various associations with the public good at heart, are protesting against this particular form of municipal economy. "We cannot afford," say they, "to limit the power and usefulness of the child-garden. Little human plants must be watered and fed with good influences to grow up strong and wholesome. Every cent spent upon the children decreases juvenile—and in the end—adult criminology; and tends to the production of conscientious citizens and voters. Money spent in making children good, wise and healthy, is well invested." Chicago was among the first—if not the first—of our large cities to give encouragement to the kindergarten movement; she has been liberal to her public schools, and has one of the finest universities in the world. She will doubtless find some way to make her public school system keep pace with her development in other directions.

Said one little chick, with a funny little squirm,
"I wish I could find a nice fat worm."
Said another little chick, with a queer little shrug
"I wish I could find a nice, fat bug."
Said a third little chick, with a strange little squeal,
"I wish I could find some nice, yellow meal."
"Now, look here," said the mother, from the green garden patch,
If you want any breakfast, you must get up and scratch."

TRUST

O LITTLE head upon my heart
A willing burden pressed,
A needed lesson comes to me
Through all your childish rest.
If I, so erring and so weak,
Can love my child so well,
God's love for those who trust in him
What finite mind can tell!
Would I, for wanton pleasure, harm
One little golden thread
That, moist and curling, softly clings
About that darling head?
O heart, so weak, cast off thy fear,
And calmly, sweetly rest;
Less safe thou canst not be upon
Thy Father's loving breast.

The Story of a Watch

A CANADIAN reader of this journal, Mary S. Williams, of Knowlton, Quebec, sends this pretty little incident of personal experience:

When a little girl, my wish was to possess a watch. My delight, therefore, may be imagined when on my tenth birthday, my grandmother presented me with a gold one, which had belonged to her. "You must value it very highly, Mary," said my mother, as I joyfully fastened it in my dress. I promised earnestly that I would take all possible care of it, and indeed I meant to do so. But one day a dreadful thing happened. Yielding to the entreaties of my little brother and sister, I went to play with them in the hay-loft which had recently been filled with new, fragrant hay. We had splendid fun jumping from the big beams, and making ourselves nests; but on my way back to the house I put my hand to my belt to get my watch, and found that it was gone! I ran back and searched here and there, all over the loft, searched until it grew dark and my legs ached painfully. I searched the next day and the next, but I could find no trace of it anywhere.

Weeks and months flew by, and I went away to boarding-school. I had never mustered up my courage sufficiently to tell my grandmother of my loss. But every night as I knelt to say my evening prayer, a special petition went up that I might find my little watch. After I had been at school for some time, my mother came to visit me, and almost the first thing I saw upon her removing her coat was the small, well-known chain which I had worn with my watch. Upon my exclamation of surprise she smilingly drew forth the watch itself, and told me the story of its recovery.

Some little time after our eventful frolic in the hay, she explained, father had occasion to sell a few loads of hay to a man living in our village. This man was astonished to find, one day, in his horse's manger, a gold watch and chain. He tried to discover the owner, and carried it to a lady living near by who used to give me music lessons. She at once recognized the watch as one which she had seen me wear at her house. So in that way it was restored to us. There was not a dent upon it, nor was it marred in any way whatever. During all the rough pitching of the hay on to the load, and off again, it had remained not only unbroken, but uninjured even by a single scratch. It had escaped the horse's teeth while lying in the manger, and fell at length into honest hands, which seemed to me a series of miracles, for I never could believe it was all merely chance.

Mother's True Lover

Our little readers may study with profit the following story, and then ask themselves the conundrum: "Which loved mother best?"

Two children arose from the breakfast table. One went to mother and said, "Mother, I love you," kissed her, went out and played all the morning with playmates. The other kissed mother and said, "I love you;" and seeing a tired look on the mother's face, remained, washed the dishes, swept the house, and then cared for the baby, that the mother might have rest and sleep.

Then when they have found out the answer, let them try to live it out. The living out of the answer will be the prettiest play in the world.

"A BEAUTIFUL POSSIBILITY"

A New and Charming Serial Story, Written Exclusively for "The Christian Herald"

CHAPTER XI

The Pain of Parting

STRENGTHENED by the remembrance that Christ had suffered pangs like those that were tearing his heart, John Randolph prepared himself for the duty which would, as he knew, try his manhood to the utmost. He must say good-by to those he loved before leaving Hollywood forever. At the usual hour for the invalid to retire for the night, John looked in on Reginald.

"Glad to see you, John," said the sufferer, "I've been looking for you all day. You don't often desert me like this for a whole day. What has happened? Have you been busier than usual?"

"I have been very busy, Rege," John answered gloomily.

"I declare, John, I'd make tracks for freedom, if I were in your shoes. You're leading the life of a regular convict, and since you've had me on your hands, a galley slave is a gentleman of leisure in comparison! Why don't you go, John? You've never had anything but injustice at Hollywood."

John fell on his knees beside the bed.

"I am going, Rege. Your father has ordered me away."

When the thought which has floated—nebulous—across our mental vision suddenly resolves itself into tangible form and becomes a solid fact to be confronted and battled with, the shock is greater than if no shadowy premonition had ever haunted the dreamland of our fancy.

Reginald gave a low cry; then he lay looking at John with eyes full of blank horror—his mind utterly refused to grasp the situation.

"You see, Rege, it is this way," said John, gently. "Your father seems to have taken a dislike to me, and lately I have fancied he was only waiting for an excuse to turn me off. As soon as those fellows began to talk to him about the horses I saw there was trouble brewing—everything I did was wrong, and once he swore at me. He would order me to bring one horse and then change his mind before I got half across the field, and then he would rail at me for not having brought the first one.

"They pitched on Neptune at last, and asked if he had been registered. I said 'No', so then they refused to pay the price your father asked and he had to come down on him. He was furious, and as soon as the men's backs were turned, he ordered me out of his sight forever. He says I have ruined the reputation of Hollywood." John's voice broke.

"But John, you mustn't go" cried Reginald. "You cannot! My father is out of his mind. People don't pay any attention to the ravings of a lunatic."

John shook his head sadly.

"He is master here, Rege. There is nothing for me to do."

"But John, it is impossible—preposterous! Why everything will go to ruin without you, and I shall take the lead."

"No, no," said John quickly. "You will be a rich man some day, Rege. Wealth is a great opportunity. Prepare yourself to use it well."

"I tell you I can't do anything without you, John. I am like a ship without a rudder. It is no use talking, I cannot spare you, you must not go!"

"If you take the great Pilot aboard, Rege, you'll be in no danger of drifting. It is only when we choose self for our captain that the ship runs on the rocks."

John had another friend to whom he must say farewell. His heart sank as he thought of that parting.

"Don, Don!" The child heard his step in the hall long before he reached the door. He was coming, as he did every night, to give her a ride in his arms before she went to bed. She held out her little arms from which the loose sleeves had fallen back. John lifted her up, for the last time.

He laid his strong, set face against the rosy cheek, and looked into the laughing eyes which the sand man had already sprinkled with his magic powder.

"Nansie, baby, I have come to say good-bye."

"Not dood-bye, Don, you always says dood-night."

"But it is good-bye this time little one, there will be no more good-nights for you and me. I am going away."

A bewildered look swept over the child's face. "Away!" she echoed, "to leave Nan and Primrose and the horsies? Me'll go too, Don. Me'll go anywhere with you, Don."

"I wish I could take you!" and John strained her to his heart. "But there is no Neptune to carry us now little one. Your father sold him this afternoon."

"My nice Nepshun!" The child's lip quivered, but something in the suffering face above her made her say quickly: "Me'll be dood, Don; an' when you come back, Nansie, 'll be waitin' for you at the gate." She patted his cheek confidingly.

"You'll miss me, Nansie. I know that. I shall ask Jesus to take care of my little pet. He loves children, Nansie, and I want you to love him."

"Nice Don! Nan loves you, dear—and Desus. Nan loves Desus 'cause you do, Don."

John's voice choked.

"Keep on loving, Nansie."

"Yes, me will. Does Desus carry children in his arms like you do, Don? Me 's so comfortable."

The little arm—soft and warm—crept closer around his neck while the golden curls swept his cheek.

"You's my bootiful man, Don. Nan 'll marry you when she gets big," and then, all unconscious of the sorrow which would greet her in the morning, the child slept.

To and fro across the floor, John trod lightly with his precious burden. His arm never felt the weight. They would be such empty arms by and bye! Then at last he laid her down, and taking a pair of scissors from his pocket, he gently severed one of the golden rings of her hair and laid it within the folds of the handkerchief which he still carried in his vest pocket. The fair girl and the little child. They should be his memory of womanhood.

In Reginald's room kind-hearted Mrs. Hawthorne was weeping bitterly. She loved John as her own son, but no one ever dreamed of disputing the imperious dictates of the master of Hollywood, however unjust they might be.

Reginald lay as John had left him, with his face buried in the pillows, and utterly refused to be comforted. What comfort could there be if John was going away? It never occurred to him that his mother needed cheer as much as he. Like all selfish souls his own pain completely filled his horizon.

CHAPTER XII

Sent to Quarantine

"I don't see what we are to do about Evadne," and Mrs. Hildreth sighed disconsolately. "She looks like a walking shadow. I should not be surprised if she had inherited her father's disease, and they say that consumption is as contagious as diphtheria."

"Horrors!" cried Isabelle. "Do quarantine her somewhere, mamma, until you are quite sure there is no danger. I haven't the faintest aspirations to martyrdom."

"It is a great care," sighed Mrs Hildreth, "all of you children have always been so healthy. I don't believe Dr. Russe will listen to her going to the seaside, and the mountains are so monotonous. Other people's children are a great responsibility."

Suddenly Isabelle clapped her hands.

"I have it!" she cried. "Send her up to Aunt Marthe, and then we can tease papa to let us go to Newport. Marion is going to spend the summer with Christine Drayton, you know, and papa does not intend to leave the city, so we can persuade him that it is our duty to seize such a golden opportunity of doing things economically. I am sure I don't know what people must think of us — never going to any of the fashionable places. For my part I think we owe it to papa's position to keep up with the world."

"I believe it might be managed," said Mrs. Hildreth, after some moments' consideration. "It was very clever of you to think of it, Isabel. You ought to be a diplomat, my dear," and she smiled approvingly on her daughter.

So it was settled and in a few days Evadne was ready for her journey. As the train swept along through the picturesque Vermont scenery, she looked out of her window with never-ending delight. "I am like a poor lonely bird," she said to herself, "who flies from shore to shore, seeking rest and finding none. Another journey in the dark. I wonder what will be at the end of this one? Well, I'll hope for the best; Aunt Marthe's letter was kind, and her name sounds cheery."

Mr. Everidge came to meet her as the train steamed into the little station, and Evadne soon found herself seated in a comfortable carriage, behind a handsome chestnut mare, bowling along a fragrant country road, catching glimpses at every turn of the verdure-clad hills.

She found her new uncle very pleasant: there was a silver-tongued suavity about him in striking contrast to the preoccupation of Judge Hildreth, and a sort of airy self-complaisance which took it for granted that he should be well treated by the world.

"I am very glad you have come, my dear niece," he said, "to relieve the tedium of our uneventful existence. You must let our Vermont air kiss the roses into bloom again in your pale cheeks. It has a world-wide reputation as a tonic. I hope you left our Marlborough relatives in a favorable attitude of mind? It is one of the evidences of this progressive age that you should be able to woo 'tired nature's sweet restorer' one night under the roof of my respected brother-in-law, the next under my own. The ancients, with their primitive modes of laborious transit, were only half alive: we, of to-day, thanks to the melodious tea-kettle and inventive cerebral tissue of the youthful Watt, live in a perpetual hand-clasp, so to speak; and by means of the flashing chain of light which girdles the globe, are kept in touch with the world. It is food for reflection that the thought which is evolved from the shadowy recesses of our brain to-day, should be, by the mysterious camera of electricity, photographed upon the retina of the European public to-morrow, and we need to have the archives of our memory enlarged to hold the voluminous correspondence of the century. Ah, Squire Higgins, good evening. My niece by marriage, Miss Hildreth, of Barbadoes." The Squire lifted his hat, there was a little desultory conversation, then the carriages went on their separate ways, and soon Evadne found herself at her destination.

She looked eagerly at the pretty house with its entourage of flowers and lawns, grand old trees and distance-purpled hills, then Aunt Marthe appeared in the doorway and she saw nothing else.

She was of medium height with a crown of soft brown hair, and eyes whose first glance of welcome caught Evadne's heart and held her captive. There was a wonderful sweetness about the smiling mouth; and the face, although not classically beautiful, possessed a subtle spiritual charm more fascinating than mere perfection of color and form. She moved lightly, with a buoyant youthfulness strangely at variance with the stately dignity of Mrs. Hildreth, and the studied repose of Isabelle.

"You dear child!"

The soft arms held her close, the sweet lips caught her in a kiss, and Evadne felt with a great throb of joy that the weary bird had found a resting-place at last.

She led her into a cool, tastefully furnished room, drew her down beside her on the couch and took off her hat and gloves, then she handed her a fan and went to make her a lemon soda.

Evadne looked around the room with its soft curtains swaying in the breeze, the cool matting on the floor with a rug or two, the light bookcases with their wealth of thought, the comfortable wicker rockers, the bamboo tables holding several cut magazines, an open work-basket, a vase with a single rose, while on the low mantel a cluster of graceful lilies were reflected in the mirror.

"Why, this is home!" she cried, and she laid her head against the cushions and closed her eyes with a delightful sense of freedom.

The early supper was soon announced, and Evadne found herself in a cozy dining-room, seated near a window which opened into a bewildering vista of summer beauty. There were flowers beside each plate, as well as in the quaintly-carved bowl in the centre of the table. Evadne caught herself smiling. That had always been a conceit of hers in Barbadoes.

Everything was simple, but delicious—the tender, juicy chicken, the delicate pink ham, the muffins, browned to a turn, the Jersey butter, moulded into a sheaf of wheat, and moist brown bread of Aunt Marthe's own making, the blocks of golden sponge cake, the crisp lettuce, the fragrant strawberries, the cool jelly frosted with snow; and Evadne drank her tea out of a chocolate-tinted cup, fluted like the bell of a flower, and felt as though she were feasting on the nectar of the skies, while Mr. Everidge's silvery tones kept up a constant stream of talk, and Aunt Marthe's beautiful hospitality made her feel perfectly at home. Mr. Everidge looked the picture of health, but he seemed to have the self-centred thoughts of an invalid.

"Tea, my dear Evadne," he said, as he passed her cup to be refilled, "is an infusion of poison which is slowly but surely destroying the coatings of the gastronomical organ of the female portion of society. I tremble to think of the amount of tanin which analysis would show deposited in the systems of the votaries of the deadly five o'clock, and the unhealthy nervous tension of the age is largely traceable to the excessive consumption of the pernicious liquid. Chocolate, on the contrary, taken as I always drink it, is simple and nutritive, with no unpleasant after-effect to be apprehended; but this decoction of bitter herbs, steeped to the death in water far past its proper temperature, is concentrated lye, my dear Evadne, nothing but concentrated lye. By the way, Marthe, I wish you would give your personal supervision to the preparation of my hot water in future—nothing comparable to hot water, Evadne, just before retiring—it aids digestion and induces sleep, and sleep, you know, is a gift of the gods. The Chinese mode of punishing criminals has always seemed to me exquisite in its barbarity. They simply make it impossible for the unhappy wretches to obtain a wink of sleep, until at length the torture grows unbearable and they find refuge in the long sleep which no mortal has power to prevent. So, my dear Marthe, see to it, if you please, in future that my slumber tonic is served just on the boil.

"See to it also, my dear, that I am not disturbed at such an unearthly hour again as I was this morning. Tesla has put himself on record as believing that the want of sleep is a potent factor in the deplorably heavy death-rate of the present day. He thinks sleep and longevity are synonymous, therefore it becomes us to bend every effort to attain that desirable consummation."

Involuntarily Evadne looked at Mrs. Everidge. Her face was slightly turned towards the open window and there was a half smile upon her lips, as if, like Joan of Arc, she was listening to voices of sweeter tone than those of earth. She came back to the present again on the instant and met her niece's eyes with a smile, but in the subtle realm of intuition we learn by lightning flashes, and Evadne needed no further telling to know that the saddest loneliness which can fall to the lot of a woman was the fate of her friend.

Immediately after supper, Mrs. Everidge persuaded Evadne to go to her room. The long journey had been a great strain upon her strength and she was very tired.

"I wish you a good night, Uncle Horace," she said as she passed him in the doorway.

"And you a pleasant one," he rejoined with a gallant bow.

—"We are such stuff
As dreams are made on, and our little life
Is rounded with a sleep."

She lay for a long time wakeful, revelling in the strange sense of peace which seemed to enfold her, while the evening breeze blew softly through the room and the twilight threw weird shadows among the dainty draperies.

In the End of the Century

The Wonderful Age We Live In—Lady Curzon and International Friendships—Taking Music Lessons at Seventy—Lieutenant Hobson, &c., &c.

STRANGE things are happening in the end of this wonderful century, things which would make our old Puritan and Covenanter ancestry rub their eyes and suspect witchcraft. But they come about so gradually that we ourselves feel no surprise, and simply take the most astonishing inventions, the most revolutionary discoveries, as matters of course. There are the automobile carriages whirling smoothly over our pavements, and indicating that the day of wanton cruelty to horses will soon, thank God, be relegated to the torture chambers of the past. We have harnessed electricity to our everyday uses, so that it serves us in our doorbells and our cooking-stoves and nightly illumination, as well as in our public conveyances. Now, we are utilizing compressed air, as we have long utilized steam. We speak through the telephone to friends across the continent. We cable our messages under the ocean. We are living in an extraordinary period, and the dreams of the Arabian Nights did not approach it in their most marvelous conceptions. 1899 is still in its early morning, but we do not fear that it will be less pregnant with great issues than the years which have gone before it. And it is the gateway to the new century.

FROM CHICAGO to Calcutta is still a far cry, though not so far as it was fifty years ago. Chicago is a mushroom of the West, a city which has grown so fast and become so rich and beautiful, that it seems as if a fairy's hand had evoked it from space. Calcutta is an ancient city of an ancient land; a land of magnificent temples, mosques, and palaces, a land of squalor and dirt and decay, a land of immense wealth and utter want, a land of contrasts, a land of old traditions and mighty prejudices. The Viceroy of India, Lord Curzon, will reign in pomp and splendor in that eastern land, holding stately conferences with proud native princes who, in their secret hearts, look down on the Englishman as an up-start of the hour; will move through his dominions, representing her gracious majesty, Queen Victoria, at home, Empress of India there. And by his side, adorning his home, receiving his guests, presiding at festivities, giving tone to society, will be his lovely American wife, Lady Curzon, born plain Mary Leiter, of Chicago.

In the newly awakened friendliness between Jonathan and John, so freely expressed of late, there seems a special charm in this international marriage which sets the daughter of an American merchant-prince on the viceregal throne of India. Lady Curzon was educated as befitted a young person of her birth and breeding. Every accomplishment needed by a young woman in good society is hers. She has traveled extensively and knows men and women. She knows literature and art. In the athletic sports of the day, in golf, tennis, riding and driving, Lady Curzon excels, and she is a beautiful and gracious great lady, of whom her countrywomen may well be proud. We learn from the daily papers that Her Majesty, Queen Victoria, held a confidential talk with the wife of her viceroy before the Curzons started on their eastward journey, and we may be sure that our American girl will prove herself fully competent to carry out Her Majesty's plans and projects.

One wonders how Lady Curzon will enjoy her new home. Nothing changes in India, and she will find many of the conditions similar to those which Charlotte, Lady Canning, found when she went there, just before the mutiny. Lady Canning, writing to a friend in England, in 1856, said "The air feels like an orchideous-plant hot-house. You would be wretched at the multitude of insects. all sorts of crickets and grasshoppers perpetually creeping up under one's scarf, and black beetles an inch long, cockroaches at least two inches. The first day of the rains the dinner table was covered with creatures, as thickly as a drawer of them in a museum, and in enormous variety. Outside the house, the balustrades are garnished with rows of enormous cranes, called adjutants, hideous birds which congregate here in the rains, besides all the hawks, crows and parrots already established." The parrots as described in books about Indian natural history must be very gorgeous indeed. Rich brown, with sky-blue epaulettes, red heads, violet throats, crimson bellies and tails. Bats and lizards abound, and snakes seem to be ubiquitous. Nevertheless the wives of British officers in India seem to enjoy the life, notwithstanding its little drawbacks, and our heroic missionaries make very light of the hardships they meet, learn to love not only the people but the country itself, and turn longing eyes back to it when they return to us.

We can but hope that Lady Curzon may have a happy and useful life in India. We hope, too, that her ladyship will keep a journal, and one of these days write a book, so that we may share some of her sensations, and see the tropics from her point of view.

WHEN the pretty daughter of Admiral Sampson was married at Glen Ridge, N. J., the other day, to the young Californian who had won her hand, those of us who love College Settlement work were pleased to discover that among her guests, there was a group of boys from the Rivington Street Hamilton Club, which Mrs. Scott, as Olive Sampson, had often visited. The nation's heroes so belong to us all, that we feel as if we had a share in their wives and daughters, and at every festival event in their families, a great many invisible spectators are present.

THE death in Richmond, Virginia, at the age of eighty, of so well known a divine as the Rev. Dr. Moses D. Hoge removes from this earthly sphere a venerable figure, and a striking personality. During the years first following our Civil War I met Dr. Hoge and heard him preach, and I have never forgotten the impression made upon me by his magnificent eloquence. Tall, straight, and dark as an Indian, with piercing eyes and an incisive voice, Dr. Hoge possessed the temperament and the magnetism of the born orator. He has long been regarded as the Nestor of the Southern Presbyterian pulpit, and Virginians have felt a special pride in him, as a strong and splendid man, a courtly gentleman of the old school, and a pastor who for more than fifty years had ministered to a single loyal charge. Dr. Hoge defied the encroachments of age and remained in harness almost to the last. He will be greatly missed and deeply lamented, and not alone beautiful Richmond on her seven hills, but all Virginia and the South and Southwest, will lay their tributes on his tomb.

SPEAKING of defying age, I heard the other day of a woman seventy years old who still plays the piano finely, still takes lessons, and bears her part when friends are gathered in her stately music-room, where violins and cellos played by artists keep time with her piano renderings. There is no earthly reason, except in failing strength, why any of us should ever give up anything which we have once acquired, but alas! most of us easily suffer our accomplishments to slip away, once we have left our youth behind. But I personally know women who have learned new and difficult languages after sixty; I have a friend who began Hebrew and made good progress in it after seventy, and I am sure none of us need grow old so fast as we do, if we would concentrate our minds on remaining young and strong. There is some effort of will needed to stand up against the energy of our juniors, and the new generations forever pressing forward do to some extent obliterate those which are going off the stage, but as individuals, until the curtain drops, let us hold up our own banner, and do our own work, and yield no niche that we can help, to the maurauder, time.

THAT Lieutenant Hobson, God bless him, has gone to the Philippines, makes some of us sorry, for though a few silly schoolgirls embarrassed the brave fellow by their somewhat too demonstrative admiration, most of us were satisfied to read of his splendid exploit, and to congratulate Mother Hobson from afar on the noble simplicity of her boy. But Hobson himself is doubtless glad to go to the new scenes in the far-off Pacific; and, in the near future, a good many of our young men will be seeking glory and fortune in our new domains. The war with Spain has brought many changes. When a Governor of New York is inaugurated, there is seldom anything like a pageant. It is a common, every-day business proceeding. Not so when Theodore Roosevelt was inducted into office. Rough riders and soldiers galore were present in brilliant uniforms, and the metropolis sent some of its loveliest women and most notable men, to pay their respects to the new and popular governor. The prettiest thing about the occasion was the cluster of the Roosevelt children with their fair mother, to whom the governor gallantly bowed and waved his hand, before he took the oath of office.

M. S. B. A young man purchased a camera from a friend, who had originally bought it at a bargain, had used it two years, and added some things to it in the way of outfit. The price asked and paid by the second buyer seemed to the young man's mother an exorbitant one, and she doubts whether a Christian has a right to make extraordinary profits. It does not appear to me that any wrong was done. The writer of the letter admits that the price her son paid for the camera was lower than he would have been charged in the stores. Therefore, he obtained fair value for his money. It is no concern of theirs what the man who sold it, paid for it. There is only one qualification: The writer of the letter implies that the seller represented that it had cost him more than it had, which, of course, was wrong. But against that must be placed the fact that nothing is said about the value of the outfit, which was not included in the original purchase.

THE OTHER SIDE

OH! river of death, so darksome and still,
We know there's a track across thy wide wave,
And a boat with a seat that someone must fill,
Be he king or pauper, freeman or slave.
Yet which of them recks in his puny pride
Of the life that waits on the other side.

Shall we meet the old friends we knew were true
In the sunshiny days of long ago?
Shall we see the loved one our young hearts knew
And called her "dear mother"—we loved her so?
Shall life's loved partner who has gone before
Reach welcoming arms from the other shore?

Science is silent when we make this quest;
Human fancy ends with the "streets of gold,"
But faith says all things the Lord may think best
Shall welcome his children into the fold.
Then hold fast thy faith, oh heart, and be wise,
All you've lost will be found in Paradise.

Heart cannot conceive and eye hath not seen
What the Master hath prepared for his own,
But what we know here no sophist can screen
And all of earth's wonders point to the throne.
Man's grandest imaginings still must abide
The glory that lights up the other side.

JOY OF FINDING THE LOST

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Feb. 12. Luke 15: 1-10

NEW views of God's character are presented in the Parables recorded in this chapter. They are startling at first sight, but as we look at them we find they are consistent with other descriptions. The shepherd is represented as being concerned over his loss. The woman is troubled about the missing coin. Both make efforts and take pains to recover their lost property. Can it be possible that God, whom they represent in the Parables, has any solicitude about people that are lost to him? As we think of this great world that he made; of the vast regions of space filled with sun and stars and planets innumerable, the work of his hands, he seems far removed from us. Yet Christ portrays him as feeling the loss of a man and seeking diligently for him till he find him, and afterwards rejoicing with a joy which demands the companionship of the angels in its expression. Howsoever we may despise a man; howsoever lightly we may think of one life, it is evident that God takes a different view and that he makes an effort to recover his missing child

This is a very impressive aspect of God's attitude. The poor victim of sin, the drunkard or the dissolute who is conscious of his own worthlessness, may well ponder, as he sees in Christ's beautiful pictures, the shepherd going over the mountains looking earnestly after the missing sheep; and the woman lighting the candle and sweeping carefully to recover her coin. He cannot be so worthless as he supposes, if God searches for him, and we know what efforts God has made for the redemption of lost men. He so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son. Yes, he seeks and seeks diligently and has proved his concern by sacrifice. We wonder that it should be so, but cannot dispute the fact. Gough used to tell a story of a delicate, beautifully dressed woman who, in crossing a street, lost one of her rings, which rolled into the mud and filth of the gutter. He saw her peering down into the dirt looking for it, the anxiety over the lost jewel showing itself in her face. At last, not finding it, she turned back her handsome cape and bared an arm lovely in shape and purity. She thrust it into the black mud and groped about in it until she found her ring. There was no need to ask if the ring was precious in her sight.

Then there is pathos in the joy of recovery. When the sheep was found, its fleece was probably torn with the briers, and when the coin was found it was probably dirty and tarnished, but its value was not diminished. And it is so with the lost soul. God knows its worth and values it none the less for the pollutions that cling about it. He hates them, but the soul is precious even in its impurity. The story goes that a beautiful singer was interrupted by the ribald mockery of a drunken man; and the President called to the officers to turn out that man. The singer said: "Cannot we turn out the drink; we want the man." God wants the man, and there can be none so degraded as to justify the opinion that he is not wanted.

There is joy when he is found. The very angels, Christ says, share that joy. It is greater than the joy over the unfallen ones who have not caused concern. It is as when we welcome our friends on an incoming steamer, but go frantic with joy when the vessel comes in, that is overdue and had been given up for lost. Thus the search for the lost is God-like work, and when we succeed we actually cause joy in heaven. The thought should incite effort, for our success will please God.

Novel-readers will remember Charles Dickens' touching story of the fisherman Pegotty who went wandering all over Italy searching for his niece. She had been deceived and lured away by a dissolute young man, and her uncle mourned for her and sought her with untiring patience. From one village to another he traveled, always on foot, seeking everywhere for her, until he found her and took her home. So the Good Shepherd seeks his lost sheep. Blessed are they who help him in the work.

SAVED BY GRACE : : : IN THE BOWERY MISSION

A Converted Outcast now a Preacher in the West—A Lawyer Brought to Christ—A Drunkard Redeemed

AMONG the many instances of notable conversions that have marked the evangelistic work in the Bowery Mission within the last few years, perhaps none are more deserving of being recorded than those given below. The numerous readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD who aid, by their gifts and prayers, in supporting this mission, already know of many precious souls that have been won from sin through its ministrations. These new testimonies are in the converts' own words and may be read with spiritual encouragement and profit by all who are interested in the work of bringing sinners into the kingdom of Christ:

A Converted Outcast who became a Pastor

A few years ago a man, miserable and wretched, under deep conviction, and realizing his helplessness, and that without a Saviour he was lost, wandered past that light-house, the Bowery Mission. Attracted by the singing, which he had often heard before unheeded, this night the Spirit of God constrained him to go in, and there he heard that "Whosoever" meant himself personally; that the loving invitation "Come unto me, and there receive rest, peace and happiness," meant himself also. Taking God at his word, he came to Jesus as he was.

REV. FRED'K BAYLIS
[Bowery Mission Chapel]

It is this gladness that prompts me to write to you. I was that poor outcast, and now by the grace of God I am pastor of the M. E. church here at Imperial, Neb. I thought perhaps a few lines as to my work might be acceptable, demonstrating with St. Paul, the Apostle, that the Gospel of Jesus Christ is indeed the power of God unto Salvation to everyone that believeth. I am the only preacher up here, i. e., in Lamer, and have the western part of the county of Chase. Imperial is a town of say 300 inhabitants, and the county seat. Services are held in the court house morning and evening, and were you to see the number who come out to hear the Gospel, you would say truly the harvest is plentiful, but alas! the laborers are few. We are striving to get enough for a church building. We are praying that the money (about $1,000) may be forthcoming.

The people here are loving, kind and sympathizing, but their means are very limited, this part of the country having suffered from failure of crops until the past few years. They remember with gratitude the kindly help sent them two or three years back, from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, and you have, without perhaps knowing it, many warm friends out here.

I have besides this preaching point (which is my home), to preach Sunday afternoons at Phasl, twelve miles away, and to get there and back for evening service makes it quite interesting. Three services on Sunday! I don't know what some of our Eastern brethren would think of preaching in the morning and then driving twenty-four miles to afternoon service and back again for seven o'clock service, but God gives strength and we are well repaid—for you would indeed say, "Glory to God!" were you to see the number of teams that come out, many of them coming twelve or fourteen miles' distance.

During the week I have another point for services, Thursday evenings, at Champion, eleven miles away, and then another, Lamar, twenty miles. In all of these places the people turn out in goodly numbers, and I am striving, with the power of God's Holy Spirit, to lift up Jesus Christ in such a manner that all men and women on these Western prairies, shall be forced to confess that he is indeed altogether lovely to their souls.

You would be rather amused to see our Gospel wagon which belongs to a dear child of God up here, Bro. Morris. He has given it up to the Lord's service. So God's work goes on, obstacles are overcome, in his name, and seed scattered broadcast that shall bear fruit unto everlasting life.

Love to Mrs. Bird and Superintendent Wyburn. May God bless you in all your efforts for the advancement of his kingdom. Your brother in Christ, FREDERICK BAYLIS Imperial, Neb.

Redeemed After a Life-time of Sin

I regard it as a privilege and a duty to give you an idea of my "rounding up" at the Old Bowery Mission, Dec. 27, 1897, as well as the events subsequent thereto. I first saw the light over half a century ago in the "Hoosier" State, and I graduated in the law department of a flourishing Western college, finally blossoming forth a full-fledged disciple of Blackstone in the practice of law in my native State. Business grew apace until it yielded a respectable income. I became a member of the Episcopal Church, and up to my 25th year all was comparatively well. I then made a new departure by joining a company of young men who often sought solace in drink. Notwithstanding some of those boon companions were younger, and none of them much older than myself, they have now all gone from earth, and I am the only survivor of the once gay and dissipated band.

My second quarter of a century was filled with shortcomings, periodical reformations and resolves to work out my final salvation in my own way. All my efforts were void of sincere intention and fruitless. I at last became convinced that I was gradually wandering on the broad road that leads to destruction, and wholly unable to retrace my wayward steps. Whilst en route to New York from the West, I met a gentleman who claimed to be the leader of a mission in Pennsylvania. He told me he had been reclaimed from a life of sin and depravity. His appearance, his manner, and his utterances withal, made a good impression on my sin-ridden mind, and this lasted many months, until an opportunity enabled me to attend a meeting at the Old Bowery Mission, where I heard the testimonies of men who claimed to have been even farther from our Father's loving care than I thought I had been, and who were now living monuments of the wonderful salvation of our Master. I thereupon, with a sincere heart, sought divine assistance to strike asunder the yoke of sin that was leading me to destruction, and received an inexplicable blessing very soon thereafter. The old desires are gone! That grand old Apostle's Creed I can recite and believe every word therein, from the bottom of my heart. One year and eighteen days I have realized the peace of God which "passeth all understanding." J. RAILSBACK.

The Drunkard Redeemed

A man evidently under the influence of liquor, came forward to the Bowery Mission "mercy seat," recently, and in a very woeful voice asked if God could save him, saying he was a backslider, who had started in the new life four years ago, in Liverpool, England. He prayed very earnestly for forgiveness, and that his prayer was answered the following testimony sufficiently proves:

After the meeting, he came to Superintendent Wyburn, saying, "Here, take this (holding out three one-dollar bills). I want you to keep it, and although I have a home to go to I want to stay here all night so that the devil won't get me again." Next day he produced a five-dollar bill, saying, "Put that with the other." As soon as he was thoroughly sober, the janitor went with him and spent the money for decent clothes, for the man was almost in rags, and the money certainly would have gone for liquor had he not come to the Mission. He then went to see his employer, and the latter has restored him to his position, and now he is happy. "After working and earning good wages," said he, "I had nothing but rags and a wrecked life to show for it, but with God's help, the saloon or the devil won't get any more of it. I want to sign the pledge. My wife has sent me here telling me not to come home without the pledge in my pocket."

On the evening when he came to the Mission, this man had been cordially invited to kneel with the other penitents. He was persuaded to give his heart to God, who would give him strength to overcome temptation, which he very willingly did, calling to God to save him from his besetting sin. Instead of taking home the pledge to his wife, he went home "a new creature in Christ Jesus." He has been safely kept ever since and is to-day a living example of the Divine grace in saving the drunkard.

COME BACK TO JESUS AND HOME

COME back to Zion, O thou who once loved her,
Come back again to the Fountain of Grace
Back to the ark of thy covenant Saviour;
Come with repentance bedewing thy face.
Hast thou forgotten the peace that was once thine?
Now thou art tossed as the mad billows' foam.
Hast thou forgotten the joy of salvation?
Come back, O wand'rer, to Jesus and home!

Jesus, thy Saviour, from whom thou hast wandered,
Loves thee to-day as in years that are gone.
Though like a prodigal, careless and sinning,
Wasting the legacy Calvary won,
Come once again to the Fountain of Mercy,
No more forever from Zion to roam.
Earnestly look we for thy glad returning:
Come back, O wand'rer, to Jesus and home!

Night with its shadows, will soon be upon thee;
Enemies lurk in the way for thy soul.
Why wilt thou linger away from the Master;
Why reject him and refuse his control?
Once more shall rapture abide in thy bosom,
Peace shall be thine, even unto the tomb,
If thou returnest once more unto Zion.
Come back, O wand'rer, to Jesus and home!

"MISFITS"

The Reason why Many Christian Workers Fail

D. L. MOODY

WHY do so many Christian workers fail? Does God call a man to work and then forsake him? Does not obedience to a divine call assure success? These are questions that hundreds of Christian workers are asking themselves.

First of all, it should be clearly understood what success means. Many a man has been a failure to the world but a success to God; has lost his life that he might gain it. Moses was the greatest failure among the Egyptians when he cast in his lot with the Hebrews and turned his back upon the court of Pharaoh; but "there arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face." A humble calling, if it be a divine calling, is one of honor; and a high position, if it be contrary to the divine will, is never a reward of true success.

But even allowing for those who are serving in humble spheres of usefulness, how can the failure of earnest Christian workers be accounted for? There are many men and women, gifted in an exceptional degree and earnestly seeking to serve God, who are apparently accomplishing nothing in the building up of God's kingdom.

Lack of Adaptation In very many instances, I believe, the difficulty may be described by the commonplace term "misfit." They are seeking to do a work for which they are not adapted. But does not God adapt a man to any work to which he calls him? Yes, certainly God does equip those he commissions. The difficulty is, however, that probably the special work entered upon was not one to which God called the person.

A certain minister I once knew entered Christian work as a city missionary. He felt that he was called to devote his life to the ministry, and later years proved the truth of the conviction. For some time he labored in a city mission that was supported by a wealthy church, and in this work he was never at his best. At last he received a call to the regular ministry and is to-day one of the ablest and most influential pastors in his denomination. His was the silver trumpet for the temple worship, and in the stronghold of open vice where he first labored there was needed the ram's horn of a Joshua.

Each Man has His Gift Now the qualifications of a city missionary and regular pastor are seldom combined in one man. The same is also true regarding evangelists and teachers. To each man his gift, and to every man his work. In the work of the church there is need of a diversity of gifts, and God always calls the right man to fill the right place. To some the call comes to serve the Master in the store or workshop, to others to serve as a lawyer or a doctor or in some other learned profession, to others to serve the people of God as a pastor or teacher, to others to labor as missionaries and evangelists at home or in foreign lands. But to every man his special call in which there is assured success!

The reason that there is so much failure in the lives of many Christians is due to the fact that they scorn the field to which they are assigned. I do not mean this in any spirit of harsh or unkindly criticism. We are in the habit of measuring God's plans by our human standards and calling the one noble because it commands human attention and another mean because it fails to do so. But in God's sight his service is equally honorable when implicit obedience and love of his will prompt to action or keep trustful in inaction. I have known of mothers who bemoaned the narrow limits of their household duties and were eager to enter active evangelistic or church work. They belittle the sacred call of God to live for their children and I have never known such a one to be successful in her self-imposed work. In fact, I have known many such to be a hindrance and a discordant element in churches and missions. But perhaps the most frequent instances of a mistaken calling occur among candidates for the ministry and the foreign mission field. I have known men to enter the ministry and make utter failures who would have been useful Bible teachers, and I have known others to become failures as evangelists who were eminently qualified to be city missionaries and colporters. The difficulty has been that men too often depend upon divine guidance only in part. They yield their lives to God's service and after that assume their own charge.

I believe there are cases where ministers have not been successful in certain places and yet in other pastorates have made a success. Perhaps the conditions of the place were not fitted for him. A sensitive and nervous man may have had conditions that he had not the abilities to meet, while a man of strong convictions and good health, relying on God, would be successful in that field, while the former one by changing might be even more successful than the other in this new field.

. . . .

Thorough Training Needed One of the greatest needs of to-day is a body of young men and women who are thoroughly trained in the English Bible. I say English because just at present there seems to be an abundant supply of those who know only the original. Doubtless these acquisitions are convenient, but as the majority of our countrymen use the English language they are not reached either by a dead language or a dead theology. And, although the demand is great for such a class, there are comparatively few who are devoting their lives to this work. There are plenty of young men who are thoroughly trained in the latest methods of attacking the authority of the Bible, but few who have been trained to study beneath the surface.

Laymen's Labors Another pressing need is for young men who will prepare themselves for evangelists and lay preachers. If the multitudes of non-church-goers are ever going to be brought to the churches it is only through the labors of laymen who will first go to them with the Gospel. And I know of no better training for the foreign field than a training in city mission work. First see if you can not bring the Gospel to some poor deluded, self-deceived, self-righteous man in some American city before going to labor in China or India. Be sure that if God does not use you at home he has not called you abroad. This is a practical test for discerning between the divine call and mere sentimentalism. I have never known God to own a missionary abroad whom he had not first proved at home.

How then is a man to rightly find the field of labor God has planned for him? Firstly, yield to God to direct you by prayerful study of his Word. Secondly, continue to serve God to the best of your ability in your present field till God proves you and directs your next move. Thirdly, when God calls you to any work do not dictate what your position shall be in the work. God knows you better than you know yourself and has planned you for the work for which you are best fitted and will be awaiting you at the right time.

D. L. Moody.

MY CREED

THERE'S more true moral bravery
In those who own a wrong
Than in the deeds of heroes,
Extolled in prose or song.

There is more true, Christ-like goodness
In kindly acts to do,
Than outward forms of service,
Performed the whole year through.

BIBLE-CHAIRS IN OUR... ...GREAT UNIVERSITIES

Six Now Established by the Church of the Disciples of Christ and in Successful Operation

THE English Bible Chairs and Bible Seminaries established recently by the Disciples of Christ in connection with six different State Universities, illustrates the most practical and efficient way of solving the confessedly difficult problem of what has been called the "Godless State School." The institutions where they work are the Universities of Michigan, at Ann Arbor; Virginia, at Charlottsville; Georgia, at Athens; Missouri, at Columbia; California, at Berkley; and, Oregon, at Eugene.

PROF. G. P. COLER

H. L. WILLETT
Dean of Divinity House.

The first to be undertaken was in connection with the great University of Michigan, with the purpose (1) of providing Biblical instruction for students of the University, and other persons who may desire to study the Bible; (2) of so presenting the claims of the Christian ministry as to win to it well educated young men who are endowed by nature and qualified by character for such work; (3) of providing missionary training, especially in courses of Bible study, and the history of missions and methods along with medical and other studies in the University; and (4) of providing training for young preachers, Sunday School teachers, city missionaries, Christian Endeavor, and other church workers.

The history of this enterprise is interesting. In October, 1892, Mrs. O. A. Burgess, President of the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, recommended the establishment of Bible Chairs. The commendation was considered by a special committee which reported in favor of the endowment of one or more Bible Chairs at Ann Arbor. The proposition was strongly endorsed. The actual work of the Bible Chairs began October 1st, 1893, and has far exceeded the expectations of its most sanguine friends. Prof. Herbert L. Willett was placed in charge, and he, with his associates, offered courses of study in the History of Israel, Prophecy, Psalms, Life of Christ, Apostolic Church, Paul and his Epistles, Methods of Christian Work, and Religious Movements in America. Special courses of lectures were given on "Missions and Missionaries" and "Applied Christianity" by outside talent. Fifty-nine students took work the first year, besides a larger number from the University who received more or less instruction. At the resignation of Professor Willett to become Dean of the Disciples' Divinity House in the University of Chicago, Prof. G. P. Coler took up the work and still carries it on successfully—one hundred and thirty students having enrolled so far this year.

MRS. HELEN E. MOSES
Secretary Bible Chair Committee and a leading worker

MISS LOIS A. WHITE
Cor. Sec. Woman's Board of Missions

The same line of work has been carried on at the University of Virginia for the past three years under Profs. Willett and Young, with great satisfaction both to the University and to the Christian Woman's Board of Missions. The heirs of Col. John B. Cary have just given $10,000 toward an endowment of this work, and a vigorous effort is being made to increase it to $25,000.

Last year Prof. Young gave the same course at the University of Georgia, and will go there again this winter, where a large number of students will be reached with Biblical instruction. These three institutions are supported by the Christian Woman's Board of Missions.

On similar conditions the same church has established the Berkley Bible Seminary in connection with the University of California, and placed it under Dean S. M. Jefferson. In Missouri has been inaugurated "the Bible College of Missouri," at Columbia, working in unison with the great State University there. It is under Dr. W. T. Moore, and is becoming a power for good in that State. The last is that founded by the enthusiastic efforts of Dr. C. E. Sanderson, at Eugene, adjacent to the University of Oregon.

The Bible Chair doing its work contiguous to the State Universities may be made one of the most effective and far-reaching missionary agencies of American Christianity. Every line of Christian activity will be materially blessed. Fruitful, indeed, would be the results if all the great Christian denominations would turn their attention to the work of teaching the Bible in the great State Universities of our country.

S. T. WILLIS.

Bismarck's Mausoleum

An immense mausoleum is being prepared to receive the body of Prince Bismarck at Friedrichsruh. The building is ninety feet long and forty feet high. It is divided into two parts. The upper part is the actual burial-place, in which will be the coffins of the Prince and his wife. The lower is the crypt, which will form the family vault. A copper dome will crown the whole. The structure is designed and constructed in the impressive style of Roman simplicity. The foundation walls are of granite, lined with brick. On these are piles of the massive blocks of limestone which form the main body of the fabric. The carvings are of the simple but elegant Romanesque style. Over the door are engraved the Bismarck arms. The entrance faces the beautiful woods which the great statesman loved so well.

THE YOUNG MAN IN THE BACK SEAT,

or, The Things that Hinder

BY REV. J. W. WEDDELL

FINAL REASONS WHY HE WOULDN'T GO FORWARD

EIGHT young men have told from the back-seat of the evangelistic meeting, their respective reasons for not going forward, but there are other young men who prefer to sit there for different reasons. Let us hear from them:

9. "I don't see it yet."

Be gentle with this young man. He is seeking the light, and you may help him find it. If he were a total unbeliever he would not be here. He is a doubter; that is something different. "Doubt," said Drummond, "is can't believe; unbelief is won't believe. Give him a little help. Well, here is a word that ought to be of aid. We heard it spoken by the college president in the chapel service. "Young man," he said, "you are looking too far ahead. By no manner of means can you take that step ten feet away. You must take the pace just in front of you, then will come another, and another, till the whole is reached and passed. One step at a time, one thing at a time—there is the resolver of doubt.

"No, I won't take it," said blunt, outspoken John Robertson, of Glasgow, as he refused the lantern held out to him by his sceptical friend. "Why! the night is dark, and you'll be caught in the bog." "I want a light," broke out the preacher, "that will light up all the way at once." Then the doubter recalled his own fatuous objection to the Word of Truth. Take the lamp and light. Hold it close to the halting feet. It will light you, one step at a time, but it will bring you safe home.

10. "What's the use?"

This young man is holding on to the back seat as if he thought there were certainly some use in doing that — as if indeed his whole salvation depended on it. "What's the use of going forward," he says, "I don't see that it does any good. If I'm going to be saved I can be saved here as well as anywhere." Yes, that is true, but, nevertheless, you won't be saved where you are. It is the plea of pride, and when the soul makes an issue with God, however trifling it may seem, it must yield and obey or salvation and the sense of pardon are far removed.

I have never seen it otherwise: nor have you. When one comes to dictate terms to God for the bestowment of his mercy he is left there, dictating. He makes no step of advance till he goes back like Jacob to his hill-side and, wrestling, yields. "What's the use" of holding out. If you really want to be saved you will do anything to put yourself in the way of it.

11. "I don't count."

Very modest, this young man is. "Never mind me," he says, "I don't count."

But who are you to say you are of no account? You are not your own handiwork. You are God's creation. He has something to say of that which he has made. Is there not latent pride here? It looks like humility, or at least it speaks like it; but it holds itself distinctly in the attitude of haughtiness and arrogance toward God and toward men. Down in your heart you feel that you are as good as anybody—in fact, a little better than the most; and toward God there is invet-erate resentment and resistance. Standing where you are, young man, you manifestly count as a rebel against God and a stumbling-block to men.

Step down from that conspicuous aloofness of yours. Like the one just spoken of you are trying to avoid the issue and shirk the instant duty. It is only a little distance between the place you now occupy and the seats at the front, but in your present mood it means an infinity of space 'twixt you and your peace. To stand and to lift the hand is but a question of feet and inches, but that foot and that inch belong to pride. Cross it, and in true humility come to Jesus.

12. "Oh, I m just looking on."

Indifference. His name is legion. You approach this person and he assumes a careless, unconcerned air and lightly, smilingly says "Oh, I simply came in to see what was doing here. I'm just looking on."

Young man, how long do you suppose you can keep this up? Do you suppose that when Gabriel's trumpet sounds you will be "just looking on;" or when the "come, ye blessed," is spoken, are you willing to be "just looking on?" Be reasonable now.

But, to tell the truth, you know you are not indifferent. Your presence and your continued attendance have indicated that. You are dissatisfied, and you know it, as we do. Come, have a part in this salvation with us. "Seek ye the Lord, while he may be found; call ye upon him, while he is near."

Do you recall Zaccheus in the sycamore? He was just looking on. But his strenuous looking-on gave indication that he sought yet more, and when that gracious voice said, "Come down, for to-day I must abide at thy house," he ceased to be an on-looker and became in very truth a son of Abraham. Go and do likewise.

13. "I'm thinking of it."

Indecision is his name and, unless he shakes it off, it will be the death of him. "Yes, I'm thinking of it, I'm coming," but he never comes, and death is coming, surely coming, death and darkness—dark night of utter unconcern and apathy.

For thinking never saved any man. It has cost many a man his soul. "I hate vain thoughts," says God's word. When God says, "My son, give me thy heart," thinking is saying no—doing is the only obedience.

14. "I'm not fit."

This young man has great respect for the Gospel and for the religion of the Lord Jesus Christ. When you approach him he drops his head and says, "Sir, I'm not fit." Looking at him you cannot help but love him, and you desire him for the Master.

Brother, you say "I am not fit." Not fit for what? Do you mean you are not fit to be helped, not fit to be given a hand and lifted up? Why truly, friend, you have not been thinking of what you were to get at all; you have been thinking of self. This is not real respect for religion.

15. "I've been through this before."

This one is away back, scarcely inside the door, and there is a hard look on his face and a hard tone to his voice. "Let me alone!" he says, turning aside; "I've been through this before."

But we will not let him alone; we dare not. It would be like abandoning a man in the swift current of the rapids. For to go on thus means sure destruction, and the cataract is not far ahead. To keep on and on "going through this," without getting anything out of it, means going through into the pit at the last.

Gospel-hardened, we call it, but it is not that. It is excuse-hardened, will-hardened, self-hardened. The Gospel hardens no man's heart. It softens, refreshes, and sanctifies, wherever it is admitted. Come, friend, open the door of your heart a little way, let in a bit of the old Gospel, and see what will take place.

GEMS FROM NEW BOOKS

THE FAITH OF A CHILD.*

"WILL you tell us more about Jesus coming back?" Guy inquired rather anxiously, throwing himself on the sand and looking up at Mr. Grant with solemn, large eyes.

Berry broke in impetuously:

"Guy asked old Sam, who was going out shrimping this morning, if he thought Jesus would come back to-day, and Sam said he didn't think he would, so Guy called out that was just the reason he would be very likely to come, for it says: 'In such an hour as ye think not, the Son of Man cometh.'"

Mr. Grant took out his pocket Bible and opened it at the twenty-fourth chapter of St. Matthew.

"I will read you what the Lord himself said about it, and that will be better than any words of mine."

Very gravely and reverently he read the latter part of the chapter, explaining as he went, and the twins' intelligent remarks proved that they were taking it in.

"Like lightning!" said Guy, after the twenty-seventh verse had been read; "he can't have started yet, Berry! Why, as soon as he starts he will be here!"

"He might be here before we finish the chapter," observed Berry, looking out upon the ocean in front of her.

Mr. Grant read on, and finished the chapter. The children were silent for a minute, and then Berry said, doubtfully:

"Are Guy and me God's servants? I don't want to be a servant. Thomas says Guy is no better than one—the Bible says so; but he can't find a text about me being a servant."

"I should like to be God's servant," Guy put in softly.

"What is a servant's chief duty?" asked Mr. Grant.

"To do what they are told," Guy said, quickly.

"And do you do what God tells you?" asked Mr. Grant.

Guy considered. "No!" he said; "but I don't think I'm old enough to be one of God's servants."

"You are quite old enough. No child is too young to obey."

"We don't obey anyone but father," put in Berry, quickly; not unless we're quite obliged to."

"If you don't obey God you must disobey him," Mr. Grant went on, quietly. "I could read you another verse from the Bible that says that Jesus Christ will come again and punish those who are disobedient to God."

"I know," nodded Berry, looking at Mr. Grant solemnly; "I expect he would cut me asunder and send me away to weep and gnash my teeth. If he came back to-day he would."

Guy looked at his sister with awe.

"My dear children," said Mr. Grant, "God doesn't want you to perish. Jesus died to save you from that. He left heaven and came down here to do it. God knew you could not be perfectly good and obedient children, so Jesus said he would come and be good and obedient instead of you. He said he would be punished for your sins. God won't punish you now. He doesn't punish twice."

"God doesn't punish twice," he repeated, with emphasis; then why does Thomas tell me I'll be lost if I don't repent?"

Mr. Grant hesitated. "He means if you won't take Jesus as your Saviour you will be lost," he said, slowly. "God is holding out a pardon for each of you. He says, 'Here, dear children, my son Jesus offered himself a sacrifice, and died to get this for you; will you have it? Will you believe me when I tell you I never punish twice—that your sins are laid on Jesus, and that he bore your punishment? I want you to be my little servants. Take your pardon and thank me for it; and then I will help you to serve me faithfully!"

"And shall I be saved like that?"

"Christ died for our sins," quoted Mr. Grant, looking at the boy's flushed face. Would you not like to take your pardon from God and thank him for it?"

For a moment Guy was silent, then he started to his feet and ran as fast as his legs could carry him.

Mr. Grant felt astonished, but Berry looked up, gravely.

"He's gone to do it."

"Where has he gone?"

"Why, into the house of course, to his bed. Don't you speak to God on your bed? We always do; we can't say our prayers nowhere else. Guy did tell me he spoke to God in the garden the other day, but it wasn't proper, and I told him so."

Mr. Grant could not help smiling at the self-assumed tone of the little maiden; and, drawing her to him, he asked: "And what is Berry going to do?"

"I don't understand like Guy," she said; "it's too difficult. I want to be ready when Jesus comes back, but I'm dreadfully afraid I shan't be quick enough." Then, with one of her quick, silvery changes of mood, she added: "Oh, do come and see Ginger's puppies in the stable—they're such darlings."

"No, I want to go farther on while the tide is out. Say good-bye to Guy for me, and remember, 'In such an hour as ye think not the Son of Man cometh.'"

The young clergyman strode away with a wrapt glance to the heavens above, and Berry watched him disappear round the corner of a cliff.

ALLIED FOR RIGHTEOUSNESS

A British Pastor's Idea of the Probable Results of an Anglo-American Alliance

IN the course of a recent address to young men, by Dr. John Clifford, President of the Scotish National Free Church Council, he drew the following sketch of the advantages which might be expected from an alliance between his country and ours:

"The war between the United States and Spain, stamps 1898 as ineraseably as the French Revolution stamps 1793: and it will determine the character of the progress of the new century more than anything else that has happened in our own generation For it has converted the people of the United States of America from what I may call an insular into an imperial power; using that word in its best sense. It has broadened, if it has not heightened their aims. Men of lofty character and clean motive maintain that the Prov.dence that has shaped their course hithert , now marks out this path for them, and they must take it. They are compelled to accept the consequences of their interference on behalf of the Cubans. They must set a new pace in, and create a new type, of Colonial Evolution. They affirm that the good of the people they have rescued from indescribable, barbaric and clerical tyrannies, forces them to undertake the further and far more difficult task—a task requiring infinite skill and patience, untiring philanthropy, and pure patriotism—the task of bringing the Cubans and Philippines up to the full standard of American citizenship. It is with the United States and Cuba as it is with us in Egypt. Whilst you are out of a country, it is not difficult to keep out; but, when once you have intervened, the difficulties of getting out again increase every day.

"But there is an aspect of this subject of more immediate interest to us if it is not of more importance to the world. You have not forgotten the astonishment of Europe at the complete and absolute collapse of the Spanish maritime forces. Victory came from the first blow. Admirals Dewey and Sampson went, and saw, and conquered. Perhaps it was not much to do considering the condition of the Spanish fleet; but the rapidity with which the crash came was a surprise to the European powers, and with the natural instinct of self-preservation natural to despotisms, they were eager to intervene on behalf of Spain, and had it not been for the decisive action of Great Britain, they would have prevented the completion of the work the United States had undertaken.

"That act of the English people will not be forgotten by the Americans. England it was felt had atoned for the follies of George III. and his cabinet. The Anglo-American Alliance—informal but real—sprang then and there into fruitful existence. The grounds of strife were swept away. It was felt that we are one in blood and in idea, one in language and in aim, in sentiment and in thought, in devotion to liberty and to progress. The middle wall of partition is broken down. Ephraim shall not vex Judah, nor Judah Ephraim; but they shall march together for the deliverance of the oppressed; for the suppression of political clericalism all the world over; for the final abolition of the military system; for the defence and protection of liberty of conscience, equality of opportunity, reverence for truth, and the establishment of universal righteousness. I firmly and honestly declare my belief that the entrance of the United States amongst the 'World Powers' will prove to be the most important step taken in political government within the century.

"Young men, welcome the upspringing of this new 'World Power!' Promote by speech and deed this holy alliance of the free for the free! Stand by it, as by one of the most cherished gifts the year has brought you. Young as it is, it has penetrated the councils of Europe, lowered the pride and checked the advance of hoary despotisms; given birth to a higher conception of colonial expansion, and pledged the extension of the kingdom of God.

You need a good blood medicine now to impart strength and to give a feeling of health and vigor to the whole system. Hood's Sarsaparilla is the best medicine money can buy.

Catarrh...

and the allied diseases gout, rheumatism and kidney troubles, are all largely due to retention of uric acid in the system. Hence the value of a uric acid solvent and diuretic remedy which regulates and stimulates the action of the kidneys.

Tartarlithine...

is largely prescribed by physicians for these complaints.

MR. F. J. MORRIS, New York City, writes: I am now 55 years old, and have had catarrh since I was a child. I was also affected with rheumatic trouble. I knew enough of my case to believe that my catarrh was connected with the rheumatic condition, and as your Tartarlithine was stated to be a specific for rheumatism I concluded to try it. After using one bottle my bronchial cough left me entirely, and the catarrh l secretion was considerably l ss. After the second bottle I find that I am entirely free from catarrh.

Temperance. Dayton, O. What was the official result of the Canadian plebiscite vote?

The totals, as officially announced, were: affirmative, 278,487; negative, 264,571; total majority for the affirmative, 13,916.

H. A. S. 1 Do not public prayers violate Christ's injunction to enter into the closet when we pray? 2. Is not the promise (John 16: 23) absolute, that whatsoever we ask in Christ's name shall be granted? 3. What was the origin of the popular superstition about the number thirteen?

1. No. Christ referred to the ostentatious devotion of the Pharisees who chose a public place for their devotions, with the motive that men might see them and honor them as pious people. There are many intimations in the New Testament that God approves of his people meeting together for prayer. 2. The facts are against the theory. God reserves to himself the right to answer prayer or leave it unanswered. It is well that he does so; otherwise people might have things through prayer that they account blessings but would prove curses to them. They do not know what is best for themselves; therefore God, like a wise human father does not answer all prayers. The disciples were in such a situation that Christ made the promise to them; but, as you know, Paul did not have the privilege. His thrice repeated prayer for the removal of the thorn in the flesh, was not answered. 3. It is not certain. Some trace it to the number who sat down to the Last Supper.

Of the Manila Campaign, Major-General Wesley Merritt was officer commanding.

W. R. W., Aneta, N. D. A pastor here is deeply interested in hypnotism and is practicing on people.

He had better let it alone and preach the Gospel. A pastor should preach Christ, and not be diverted from his mission by a pseudo-science which is practiced chiefly by charlatans.

M. K., Pembroke, Ont. Is there any truth in the published reports of Lieut. Hobson kissing women in public? I am an American and am put to shame by the frequent allusions to the matter.

There is no doubt that the reports have been greatly exaggerated. Mr. Hobson himself, while admitting what he did, has declared in a published card that the printed accounts of his actions were grossly overdrawn.

C. R., Scott, Wis. Why was the man who had [illegible] severely punished for an offense which might have been the result of poverty?

The bridegroom's family furnished appropriate garments to the guests. This man's offense consisted in his despising and rejecting the garment provided for him. He preferred to attend in his own ordinary attire. The significance of the parable is that God's way of salvation through Christ is often rejected by men who think their good moral character is sufficient for them, and that they do not need the salvation which Christ offers them.

B. W. D., Cotint, Mass. Can you tell when the wall that encloses the Chinese Empire was built? Also how long and broad it is?

The Chinese wall was begun 214 B.C., under supervision of Che Hwang-te, one of China's greatest emperors, who conceived the idea of protecting his kingdom from the tribes of Tartary. Its length has been estimated at 1,250 miles; total height, including parapet, 20 feet; thickness at base, 25 feet; at top, 15 feet. Towers or bastions occur at intervals of 100 yards. These are 40 feet square at base, 30 at summit, and are from 37 to 50 feet high.

Mr. J. Young, of the Upper Canadian Bible Society, Toronto, Canada, writes:

Noticing that many of your correspondents are sending you accounts of very old Bibles, I enclose [illegible] dating back to Queen Anne Boleyn, mother of Queen Elizabeth. The Bible belongs to a member of this family. For a museum or public library it would be quite an acquisition. It is bound in carved oak covers, with leather and iron clamps, similar to those old Bibles that were chained in the cathedrals. It is in good condition except, that like so many of these old Tudor Bibles, a few leaves are missing at the beginning and end of the book. Your correspondent, H. Whitman Dodge (Jan. 18) is in error about the date of "A Tyndale Bible"—1526. The very first Bible printed was 1535. Your correspondent may have a New Testament of 1526, but not a Bible.

"Mrs. G.", Poolesville, Md., has a Bible printed in 1626, in London, by Bonham Norton and John Bill. "Printers to the King's Most Excellent Majestie." "Anno Dom." 1626. This Bible contains all the Canonical Books, the Apocrypha, the Psalms, set to tunes, and a portion of the "Prayer-book."

Reader, Bingham, Me. Is it a sin for a person who is hard at work in mills, shops or stores all the week to go on Sunday on an excursion to a watering-place or the mountains?

J. M. T., Severn, Va. Do you think it is possible for a healthy person to attain to a high degree of sanctification? Is not sickness the usual path by which the blessing comes?

Sickness has been so blessed to many persons. In being withdrawn from business, or domestic occupations, the mind has dwelt on spiritual things and has made progress which it might not have made in ordinary circumstances. Then, too, the support God gives to his child under suffering, often draws the sufferer nearer to him. But that is not the only path of attainment. There are some who have attained the higher life without it, and have been very active in God's service. Their lives prove that such attainment is possible to a healthy person. The child of God [illegible] ness to lead the Christ life on earth.

Old Subscriber, Minneapolis, Minn. Times are hard with me this year. I do not see how I can afford to renew my subscription, but I should miss the paper terribly. Can you not send it to me free?

We cannot do it. Such a course would tend to financial ruin. Indeed, we take no pleasure in dropping friends from our subscription list, but we cannot afford to supply the paper free. However, we will gladly help you to help yourself, and therefore submit this proposition. If you will get for us every six months one new subscriber, either with or without premium, we will continue the paper to you without any expense to yourself; in other words, for two full-paid subscribers a year, we will send your copy of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD free of charge. Then you will feel that you are actually earning it, and that it is not coming to you as a gift, and we will not feel that we are giving away the paper a thing we cannot afford to do—but that we are getting a proper return for it.

AN ITINERANT BIBLE AND TRACT SELLER IN NORTHERN CHINA.

Our illustration shows one of the marvels which have been wrought, in spite of continual persecution, by missionaries and native Christian workers in China. The book-vendor in the picture wears the costume of Northern China. The inscription over his little hand-cart (so well loaded with pamphlets in the Chinese language), when translated, reads: "The Books of the Religion of Jesus." Parts of the Bible, sermons, and tracts are thus carried about for distribution in many parts of the empire.

CRIMINALS BROUGHT TO CHRIST

The Salvation Army's Great Work Among Ex-Prisoners—Food and Shelter Houses, Ex-Criminals' Homes, Farm Colonies, etc.—Over 100,000 Criminals Redeemed

PICKING CANTELOUPES ON A SALVATION ARMY COLONY FARM

"Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage;
Minds innocent and quiet take
That for a hermitage."

A PRISON yet not a prison! The condition of the conscience and the mind have not a little to do with the freedom, liberty and realm of the individual. I have no doubt the experience of Bunyan in Bradford Jail, where for twelve long years he was confined because of his dogged persistence in the fight for free speech and religious freedom, was sweeter than that of many of his oppressors, his hard board bed softer and easier than the downy couch of others who were free to "wander where they would." There is not the slightest doubt that the jail cells of Philippi were less binding to Paul and Barnabas than the whole circumference of the city to some of its rulers who, without the feeling of restraint, were at liberty to "stroll at will."

Prisons must not be institutions for punishment only, much less extreme punishment, but rather schools of industry and reform. Only recently (comparatively speaking) has the study of criminology become a factor in our land. Fifty years ago, to be an unfortunate convict was to be a fit subject for the lash and the whipping post, the ducking pool, the solitary cell, the thumbscrew, the stocks; to raise the eyes, smile or move the lips without permission was unpardonable, except when the pardon was accompanied by some severe punishment. With punishment there must be the ever-constant effort to save and reform the individual.

First. By insisting upon a life of industry while under restraint.

Second. The development of the highest ideals of morals in the individual by distribution of pure literature and personal appeals.

Third. By the State furnishing every possible opportunity to the spiritual development of each individual, which happily is the case in most of our institutions.

Our purpose should be to send the individual away from the institution a reformed or saved man, with all the elements of honesty, sobriety and industry aflame in his bosom, and then we should see to it that every man so leaving the prisons of our land shall have the opportunity to begin life anew with a reasonable hope of some degree of success. The position the Salvation Army takes upon practically every phase of human life is now very generally known. It is well known that the "all important" point with the Army, in dealing with every class of society, is the insisting upon the personal salvation, the uttermost regeneration of the whole man, body, soul and mind, by repentance toward God and faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, and the baptism of the Holy Spirit, the feeling and expressing deepest sorrow for the wrong of the past, completely renouncing all that is evil, and being purged from the love, guilt and power of sin. But we realize that the State has work to do, and with that we do not interfere. We only ask that the State do its work well, apply the system that combined experience and wisdom has demonstrated is the wisest and best, temper justice with humanity; but after the State as a State has done all that by law and humane administration it can do, there remains still a great work to be done. It is this "afterwork" which the Salvation Army seeks to do.

There are those who believe it is practically impossible to reform or save a criminal. The Salvation Army can produce not only a few instances who will refute this subtle assertion, but thousands can be massed for grand review who have passed through the Army homes, shelters and factories, whose noble lives today are an inspiration for more desperate and widely extended efforts in the field of criminology. It is a hard and rocky soil we know, but with proper care the seed of righteousness will grow and bring forth fruit that will bless the world.

It is estimated that, since the Salvation Army operations began, upwards of one hundred thousand criminals alone have been permanently saved! This, according to our definition of the word, means that they have renounced the hidden things of dishonesty, walk no longer in craftiness, and, further, have become abstainers from rum and tobacco, and live lives of industry that produce the desirable fruits of righteousness and peace.

Since General Booth launched his great social scheme for the amelioration of the submerged, it has since been pushed to such marvelous success that to-day we have 111 slum posts, thirteen children's homes, ninety-two homes for women, twelve ex-criminals' homes, 122 food and shelter homes, thirty-four labor bureaus, fifty-three factories, and thirteen farm colonies—the latter ranging from 250 to 1,000 acres—with a capacity for caring for 18,000 submerged mortals every day. 15,000 miserable, uncared-for men, women, and children are given shelter every night. When he launched this scheme, he said it was the legitimate outcome of his labors for the salvation of the poorest souls he could find; that he often grieved over their hunger for "the bread which perisheth" while he was trying to induce them to receive "the Bread of Life," and that, in a small way he tried to satisfy the gnawing pangs of hunger before reproving them for their sins, and he found it ever so much easier to get a hearing when men had their hunger appeased. That was practical religion.

But what about the criminal. The same principle applies. The convicts were willing, aye, often anxious, to hear the Word of God preached by men and women whom they really believed lived it; but how often they said, "gladly would we embrace the opportunity to be Christians and be good; but the water is too deep; we cannot get out of our present predicament without help." What did they mean? Discharged with the mark of "criminal" across their foreheads—marked men. Somehow or other, detectives and police officers have not always considered their work finished when the culprit was lodged in prison. They have often felt called upon to studiously watch for his coming out, and if he sinned again, to "pinch" him, and if he quietly went to some honest employment, to inform his employer or work-mates of his past. This served its purpose only too well, for almost invariably he would be discharged and cast adrift. To wander where? Never mind, he generally found his way to prison again. The Army seeks to meet this difficulty:

MRS. (CONSUL) BOOTH-TUCKER

First. By conducting meetings in prisons:

Second. By opening prison homes and institutions of industry, that any ex-convict may enter, upon leaving prison, if he but expresses:

A. A desire to lead an honest life;

B. And is willing to do such work as is alotted to him; (A man who is not willing to work is not sincere in his confession of repentance. We impress this fact upon them and refuse utterly to accept anyone who is unwilling to work for his support).

C. Imprisonment, and specially a long imprisonment, incapacitates a prisoner for heavy work, consequently work must be found that will be at once profitable and suitable.

Third. In our homes and factories and farms we have two ends in view:—

A. Laying the foundation for a sturdy, Christian character.

B. The finding of employment for ex convicts in places where they will be treated as honest men, and where there will be no danger of discharge because of their past

Out of 4,000 men who passed through our institutions in a given time, we are gratified to find seventy-eight per cent. of them proved entirely satisfactory, and became not only law-abiding but honorable and respected members of society.

The colored illustration on the first page of this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD represents the method of the Salvation Army in the prison. Meetings are conducted by the Army from shore to shore of our nation; in every State and almost every county and city, the prison meeting is a feature of work that draws out the tenderest sympathy of the officer. The illustration shows the gifted wife of the American Commander, F. de Lautour Booth Tucker, Mrs. (Consul) Booth Tucker, addressing a large number of convicts in one of our State prisons. What must be the effect upon the heart of even a hardened man, hardened to sin, when he listens to the sweetest message ever sung by angels or mortal men, brought to him so tenderly, so lovingly and gracefully as conveyed by this remarkable, refined, cultured, sympathetic seeker of souls?

Mrs. Booth-Tucker had watched patiently at the bedside of a sainted mother, whose life had been given for sinners. She saw the light of life go out. After the crisis had come and mother was gone, she threw herself more fully (if that were possible), into the battle for souls, and with her husband, crossed the seas to India, and there sought the salvation of the heathen and the poor. Her health failing, she returned, and it afterwards proved for the purpose of carrying the inspiration of a holy life and the glad message of the love of God to the millions of Americans. She has found time to answer the call to nearly every large city in the United States, from Portland, Me., and Boston, to Minneapolis, Seattle, San Francisco, Los Angeles and back again several times. She has lifted her sweet voice in the drawing-room of the affluent, and in the crowded halls and churches, to the multitudes who have come from far and near to hear and see her. The effect has been ever the same—hearts of strong men and women have been moved toward God and heaven. On her last visit to the West the halls and churches were crowded, many being unable to gain admission, but nowhere has she been more heartily welcomed, nowhere has she touched deeper wells of emotion and feeling, and nowhere has she more thoroughly enjoyed her efforts, than when pouring her heart out to the prisoners to-day in the Cleveland workhouse, and to-morrow at San Quentin penitentiary. So long as God raises up such leaders, so long will hope for the reclamation and salvation of the tens of thousands of criminals in our land burn brightly in our hearts.

ABUSE OF TRUST-FUNDS

A Sermon by T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Job 8: 14. . . . . Whose trust shall be a spider's web

THE two most skilful architects in all the world are the bee and the spider. The one puts up a sugar manufactory and the other builds a slaughter-house for flies. On a bright summer morning when the sun comes out and shines upon the spider's web, bedecked with dew, the gossamer structure seems bright enough for a suspension bridge for aerial beings to cross on. But, alas for the poor fly, which in the latter part of that very day, ventures on it, and is caught and dungeoned and destroyed! The fly was informed that it was a free bridge, and would cost nothing, but at the other end of the bridge the toll paid was its own life. The next day there comes down a strong wind, and away goes the web, and the marauding spider and the victimized fly. The author of my text, who was a leading scientist of his day, had no doubt watched the voracious process of this one insect with another, and saw spider and fly swept down with the same broom, or scattered by the same wind. Alas, that the world has so many designing spiders and victimized flies!

There has not been a time when the utter and black irresponsibility of many men having the financial interests of others in charge, has been more evident than in these last few years. The bankruptcy of banks and disappearance of administrators with the funds of large estates, and the disordered accounts of United States officials, have sometimes made a pestilence of crime that solemnizes every thoughtful man and woman, and leads every philanthropist and Christian to ask, What shall be done to stay the plague?

First of all, I charge the blame on careless, indifferent bank directors and boards having in charge great financial institutions. It ought not to be possible for a president or cashier or prominent officer of a banking institution, to swindle it year after year without detection. I will undertake to say that if these frauds are carried on for two or three years without detection, either the directors are partners in the infamy and pocket part of the theft, or they are guilty of a culpable neglect of duty, for which God will hold them as responsible as he holds the acknowledged defrauders. What right have prominent business men to allow their names to be published as directors in a financial institution, so that unsophisticated people are thereby induced to deposit their money in, or buy the script thereof, when they, the published directors, are doing nothing for the safety of the institution? It is a case of deception most reprehensible. Many people with a surplus of money, not needed for immediate use, although it may be a little further on indispensable, are without friends competent to advise them, and they are guided solely by the character of the men whose names are associated with the institution. When the crash came, and with the overthrow of the banks went the small earnings and limited fortunes of widows and orphans, and the helplessly aged, the directors stood with idiotic stare, and to the inquiry of the frenzied depositors and stockholders who had lost their all, and to the arraignment of an indignant public, had nothing to say except "We thought it was all right. We did not know there was anything wrong going on." It was their duty to know. They stood in a position which deluded the people with the idea that they were carefully observant. Calling themselves directors, they did not direct. They had opportunity of auditing accounts and inspecting the books. No time to do so? Then they had no business to accept the position. What first of all is needed is that five hundred bank directors and insurance company directors resign or attend to their business as directors. The business world will be full of fraud as long as fraud is so easy.

"Oh," some will say, "better preach the Gospel and let business matters alone." I reply, if your Gospel does not inspire common honesty in the dealings of men, the sooner you close up your Gospel and pitch it into the depths of the Atlantic Ocean the better. An orthodox swindler is worse than a heterodox swindler. The recitation of all the catechisms and creeds ever written, and partaking of all the communion chalices that ever glittered in the churches of Christendom, will never save your soul unless your business character corresponds with your religious profession. Some of the worst scoundrels in America have been members of churches, and they got fat on sermons about heaven when they most needed to have the pulpits preach that which would either bring them to repentance, or thunder them out of the holy communions where their presence was a sacrilege and an infamy.

We must especially deplore the misfortunes of banks in various parts of this country in that they damage the banking institution, which is the great convenience of the centuries, and indispensable to commerce and the advance of nations. On their shoulders are the interests of private individuals and great corporations. In them are the great arteries through which run the currents of the nation's life. They have been the resources of the thousands of financiers in days of business exigency. They stand for accommodation, for facility, for individual, State, and national relief. How nefarious, then, the behavior of those who bring disrepute upon this venerable, benignant, and God-honored institution!

We also deplore abuse of trust funds, because the abusers fly in the face of divine goodness which seems determined to bless this land. We are having a series of unexampled national harvests. The wheat gamblers get hold of the wheat, and the corn gamblers get hold of the corn. The full tide of God's mercy toward this land is put back by those great dykes of dishonest resistance. When God provides enough food and clothing to feed and apparel this whole nation like princes, the scrabble of dishonest men to get more than their share, and get it at all hazards, keeps everything shaking with uncertainty, and everybody asking "What next?" Every week makes new revelations. How many more bank presidents and bank cashiers have been speculating with other people's money, and how many more bank directors are in imbecile silence, letting the perfidy go on, the great and patient God only knows! My opinion is that we have got near the bottom. The wind has been pricked from the great bubble of American speculation. The men who thought that the judgment day was at least five thousand years off, found it in 1898 or 1897 or 1896; and this nation has been taught that men must keep their hands out of other people's pockets.

If the first men, and especially Christian men, will learn never to speculate upon borrowed capital—if you have a mind to take your own money and turn it all into kites, to fly them over every common in the United States, you do society no wrong, except when you tumble your helpless children into the poorhouse for the public to take care of. But you have no right to take the money of others and turn it into kites. There is one word that has deluded more people into bankruptcy and State prison and ruin than any other word in commercial life, and that is the word borrow; that one word is responsible for all the defalcations and embezzlements and financial consternations of the last twenty years. When executors conclude to speculate with the funds of an estate committed to their charge they do not purloin, they say they only borrow; when a banker makes an overdraft upon his institution, he does not commit a theft, he only borrows. When the officer of a company, by flaming advertisement in some religious papers and gilt certificate of stock, gets a multitude of country people to put their small earnings into an enterprise for carrying on some undeveloped nothing, he does not fraudulently take their money, he only borrows. When a young man with easy access to his employer's money-drawer, or the confidential clerk, by close propinquity to the account-books, takes a few dollars for a Wall Street excursion, he expects to put it back. He will put it all back. He will put it all back very soon. He only borrows. Why, when you are going to do wrong, pronounce so long a word as borrow, a word of six letters, when you can get a shorter word more descriptive of the reality, a word of only five letters, the word steal?

There are times when we all borrow, and borrow legitimately, and borrow with the divine blessing, for Christ, in his Sermon on the Mount, enjoins, "From him that would borrow of thee turn not thou away." A young man rightly borrows money to get his education. Purchasing a house and not able to pay all down in cash, the purchaser rightly borrows it on mortgage. Crises come in business, when it would be wrong for a man not to borrow. But I roll this warning through all these aisles, over the backs of all these pews, never borrow to speculate—not a dollar, not a cent, not a farthing. Young men, I warn you by your worldly prospects and the value of your immortal souls, do not do it.

If I had only a worldly weapon to use on this subject I would give you the fact, fresh from the highest authority, that ninety per cent. of those who go into wild speculation lose all; but I have a better warning than a worldly warning. From the place where men have perished—body, mind, soul—stand off, stand off! Abstract pulpit discussion must step aside on this question. Faith and repentance are absolutely necessary, but faith and repentance are no more doctrines of the Bible than commercial integrity. "Render to all their dues." "Owe no man anything." And while I mean to preach faith and repentance, more and more to preach them, I do not mean to spend any time in chasing the Hittites and Jebusites and Girgashites of Bible times when there are so many evils right around us destroying men and women for time and for eternity. The greatest evangelistic preacher the world ever saw, a man who died for his evangelism—peerless Paul—wrote to the Romans, "Provide things honest in the sight of all men:" wrote to the Corinthians, "Do that which is honest:" wrote to the Philippians, "Whatsoever things are honest:" wrote to the Hebrews, "Willing in all things to live honestly." The Bible says that faith without works is dead, which, being liberally translated, means that if your business life does not correspond with your profession, your religion is a humbug.

Here is something that needs to be sounded into the ears of all the young men of America, and iterated and reiterated, if this country is ever to be delivered from its calamities, and commercial prosperity is to be established and perpetuated: Live within your means. Spend no more than you make. And let us adjust all our business and our homes by the principles of the Christian religion. Our religion ought to mean just as much on Saturday and Monday as on the day between, and not to be a mere periphrasis of sanctity. Our religion ought to first clean our hearts, and then it ought to clean our lives. Religion is not, as some seem to think, a sort of church delectation, a kind of confectionery, a sort of spiritual caramel, or holy gumdrop, or sanctified peppermint, or theological anæsthetic. It is an omnipotent principle, all-controlling, all conquering. You may get along with something less than that, and you may deceive yourself with it; but you cannot deceive God [illegible]. All your prayers go for nothing so long as you misrepresent your banking institution, and in the report of the [illegible] you put down more specie, and more fractional currency, and more clearing-house certificates, and more legal tender notes, and more loans and more discounts than there really are, and when you give an account of your liabilities you do not mention all the unpaid dividends and the [illegible] and the individual deposits, and the obligations to other banks and bankers. An authority more scrutinizing than that of any bank examiner will go through and through and through your business.

Gathered in all religious assemblages there are many who have trust funds. It is a compliment to you that you have been so entrusted; but I charge you, in the presence of God and the world, be as careful of the property of others as you are careful of your own. Above all, keep your own private account at the bank separate from your account as trustee of an estate or trustee of an institution. That is the point at which thousands of people make shipwreck. They get the property of others mixed up with their own property, they put it into investment, and away it all goes, and they cannot return that which they borrowed. Then comes the explosion, and the money market is shaken, and the press denounces, and the church thunders expulsion. You have no right to use the property of others, except for their advantage, nor without consent, unless they are minors. If with their consent you invest their property as well as you can, and it is all lost, you are not to blame: you did the best you could; but do not come into the delusion which has ruined so many men, of thinking because a thing is in their possession, therefore it is theirs.

A missionary in one of the islands of the Pacific preached on dishonesty, and the next morning he looked out of his window, and he saw his yard full of goods of all kinds. He wondered, and asked the cause of all this. "Well," said the natives, "our gods that we have been worshiping permit us to steal, but, according to what you said yesterday, the God of heaven and earth will not allow this, so we bring back all these goods, and we ask you to help us in taking them to the places where they belong." If next Sabbath all the ministers in America should preach sermons on the abuse of trust funds, and on the evils of purloining, and the sermons were all blessed of God, and regulations were made that all these things should be taken to the city halls, it would not be long before every city hall in America would be crowded from cellar to cupola.

I have also a word of comfort for all who suffer from the malfeasance of others, and every honest man, woman, and child does suffer from what goes on in financial scampdom. Society is so bound together that all the misfortunes which good people suffer in business matters come from the misdeeds of others. Bear up under distress, strong in God. He will see you through, though your misfortunes should be centupled. Scientists tell us that a column of air forty-five miles in height rests on every man's head and shoulders. But that is nothing compared with the pressure that business life has put upon many of you. God made up his mind long ago how many or how few dollars it would be best for you to have. Trust to his appointment. The door will soon open to let you out and let you up. What shock of delight for men who for thirty years have been in business anxiety when they shall suddenly awake in everlasting holiday! On the maps of the Arctic regions there are two places whose names are remarkable, given, I suppose, by some Polar expedition: "Cape Farewell" and "Thank God Harbor." At this last the Polaris wintered, in 1871, and the Tigress in 1873. Some ships have passed the cape, yet never reached the harbor. But from what I know of many of you, I have concluded that, though your voyage of life may be very rough, run into by icebergs on this side and icebergs on that, you will in due time reach Cape Farewell, and there bid good-by to all annoyances, and soon after drop anchor in the calm and imperturbable waters of "Thank God Harbor." "There the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest."

A MISSIONARY CIVILIZER

Dr. Currie's Work as Preacher, Physician, School Teacher and General Director at Cisamba, in Central Africa

CISAMBA NATIVES ENTERING DR. CURRIE'S SCHOOLHOUSE

FROM time to time, reports have appeared in this journal of the work being done at Cisamba in West Central Africa by Dr. Walter T. Currie. We have now the privilege of printing several pictures illustrating Dr. Currie's life, which have been reproduced from photographs brought home recently by Mrs. Currie, who is now here for a brief season of recuperation. Dr. Currie, as our readers may remember, went to Africa in 1886, under the auspices of the Canadian Missionary Society, whose work in Africa is done through the agency of the American Board. After laboring for about four years at his remote missionary station, Dr. Currie, having found the urgent need of medical knowledge, and realizing how much suffering he could relieve if he could treat the diseases most common in his district, returned to America and entered Dr. Geo. D. Dowkontt's medical missionary college. Early in 1893 he graduated and returned to his African station with his diploma as a physician. Since that time he has labored successfully, preaching and healing, and has the happiness of ministering to the bodies and souls of the people.

A CORNER IN DR. CURRIE'S CARPENTER SHOP

Cisamba is over a hundred miles farther inland than Bailundu, which is about two hundred miles from Benguella. Cisamba was a virgin field when Dr. Currie first arrived there. The people of the district had not the remotest idea of a missionary's object in coming among them. They were prepared to trade with him and pressed him to buy their ivory, rubber and bees wax. They even offered him slaves. When he declined these bargains, they wanted to know what he had come for, if not to trade. Dr. Currie tried to explain, but his purpose was still a mystery to the native mind. At the present time, after the lapse of thirteen years, they understand it better. Dr. Currie has not only received many of them into church-fellowship, but has taught their boys useful arts in building, blacksmithing, carpenter's work, agriculture, etc.; and is now recognized by the natives through the district as a friend and benefactor. The youths whom he has trained are in request in other districts on account of their skill and because of their steadiness. There, as with us, drunkenness frequently lays aside a workman; and it is now well known that Dr. Currie's boys do not drink intoxicating drinks. Among the more intelligent young men are some who have proved their capacity as evangelists. Since they have joined Dr. Currie's church they have studied diligently, and have been allowed at their own request to visit villages some miles distant and tell the people the message of the Gospel.

Dr. Currie has received many visits at Cisamba from chiefs and people who have heard the preaching of those native evangelists and desiring to learn more of the new religion, have come to hear Dr. Currie himself. The portrait of one of these, whose name is Hosi Kanjundu, appears on this page. He is chief of Chiyuka, a large district twenty miles from Cisamba. He is an influential ruler in West Central Africa, and has often entertained white travelers. Dr. James Johnston, whose book on this part of Africa is well known, stayed several days with him during his journey. Dr. Johnston mentions as a unique fact about him, that he was the only one of all the chiefs he met in crossing the continent who did not ask his visitor for a present. He came in state to Cisamba with one of his nine wives and a retinue of sixteen followers, and expressed a desire to hear about Christianity. He listened attentively to Dr. Currie's talk and asked whether Dr. Currie could teach him to read and write, like the boys he had seen. He was so much interested and so anxious to learn, that he paid frequent visits, staying several weeks at a time. He speedily mastered the art of reading, and is now painfully and laboriously acquiring that of writing. Mrs. Currie says: "He is a most eager scholar. He would bring his slate at almost every hour of the day if I would give him a lesson. Cipilika, one of the native evangelists, tells us that no matter how early they were assembling for morning prayers (and that is between five and six o'clock, when the bugle sounds) the chief was always first in the schoolhouse. He has put away all his wives but one. His little daughter, Ngeve, her father's special pet and favorite, always accompanies him on his visits, and often remains behind at the station until Kanjundu comes again. She is making rapid progress. She is a very painstaking damsel in all she undertakes and is outstripping many of the little girls who have been in school for over two years."

One practical proof Kanjundu has already given of his changed spirit. Dr. Currie writes: "Over a week ago he took one of the young men and went to his Ombala. While away, he tore down two spirit-houses, etc., and threw them into the river. The mixture of white clay, meal, etc., with which they are accustomed to mark an offering, to indicate freedom from guilt and appease the spirits, he also threw away. The emblems of his heathenism he brought to us as proof of what he had done. You never saw such a collection of dirty rubbish. Yet the man claims he paid a heap of money for them. He has now erected a schoolhouse in his own dominions, so that his young people can be educated."

KANJUNDU, CHIEF OF CHIYUKA

Dr. Currie superintended the building and will provide the teachers.

Another chief whose realm is known as Chipeta, has declared his intention to build a schoolhouse for his people. His eldest son has been for some time under Dr. Currie's teaching, has been baptized, and is being trained as an evangelist. Thus the good work is spreading and the native evangelists are continually bringing to Dr. Currie men who want to hear the good tidings of salvation. Two of these evangelists who went with a caravan to the coast, told the Gospel message to their fellow-travelers during the time of resting. Immediately on their starting again on the march, a young man joined them and said: "I am from the Nganguella. I am living in Bihe a free man. I have married a daughter of one of the chiefs, but no man has any money placed on me, and I owe nothing; hence I am free to act. Give me a letter, and when I return from the interior I will bring it to the white man and ask for leave to live at his village, so that I may attend school and learn their words; and then I will beg for two men to go back with me to my own country and make known those words to my own people." A letter signed by the two young men was given him. "This may or may not be the end of the matter," says Dr. Currie, "but it serves to show that the preaching in the camps tends to awaken noble impulses in the minds of others besides our own carriers."

YOUNG MOTHERS OF THE CISAMBA DISTRICT

The evangelists are all good workmen, and when they go to another village to help in building or some other work, they have opportunities to tell their message of which they gladly avail themselves. At other times they go on a regular preaching expedition. Two of them, with a small bag of books, another of corn meal, a lantern in hand, and four handkerchiefs, with which to buy rations, start on a week's tour, travel from twenty to thirty miles a day, and preach from two to four times in every twenty-four hours. Sometimes they have to sleep in uncomfortable quarters, and sometimes after a long day's journey they have retired without anything to eat. The bag of meal is now carried to provide against hunger. As a rule, however, they are very well received, housed and fed. In one place the chief built a large fire in the centre of his village, and, calling all his people together, took his seat by the side of the young men, bade them go on, and paid the closest attention to what they said.

"In a district across the Kukema River," writes Dr. Currie, "the chief received them in a distant manner, but when one recognized them as from this station he welcomed them with the utmost cordiality, begged them to remain a number of days, and he would send one of his men to guide them to the villages, for he wanted all his people to hear those words. Some of his young men had gone to the coast in company with our boys; so he wanted all his people to hear the good words. While passing through another district they inquired the road from a man. He proved to be a chief, and said: 'You have been telling these words to our neighbors. Come along to my village, and I will call the people together; we want also to hear.' The boys went, were well fed, and in the evening a much larger company gathered to hear the truth than they had expected."

It is astonishing to reflect that all this civilizing and Gospel work has been accomplished in so comparatively short a time as thirteen years. It proves how much can be done when a man puts his whole soul and life into his work, especially if he has the tact and magnetic influence which enthuses his converts and stimulates them to work. They know the country, the habits and prejudices of their countrymen and have a better acquaintance with the language than a white man can have; all of which gives them an advantage and renders their help exceedingly valuable. They have made Cisamba a centre of religious influence in a region forty miles in diameter, and have reached communities otherwise inaccessible. Dr. Currie now needs help in his medical and industrial work, and is hoping that during this year some consecrated helpers will be sent to him. He longs to devote all his time to the training of the evangelists whose services have proved so efficient hitherto.

FEEDING THE FIVE THOUSAND

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 19. John 6: 1-14

Golden Text, John 6: 35

THIS is one of the few incidents in our Lord's life which are recorded by all the four evangelists, while the Lord feeding the four thousand is recorded only by the evangelists Matthew and Mark. It was after the murder of John the Baptist that he withdrew into a desert place apart (Matt. 14: 15). The multitudes were not to be so easily disposed of; they "followed him and he welcomed them" (Luke 9 11).

The multitude followed him because they saw his miracles which he did on them that were diseased, but nevertheless they listened to the many things which he had to teach them. All through the day he taught these unwearied listeners, and at last the evening was coming on; in another hour perhaps the sun would have set, and the descent from the mountain might be dangerous. The disciples seeing this, came to him and said: "This is a desert place and the time is now past; send the multitude away, that they may go into the villages, and buy themselves victuals." Luke adds "and lodge," "for we are here in a desert place" (R.V.). "They need not depart; give ye them to eat," said the Lord. All their doing and teaching had not prepared them for this emergency. It is easier to teach than to see God equal to the emergencies of the present moment. The Lord Jesus himself, as Man, always walked with his Father; and therefore was always ready for the unexpected. "Shall we go and buy two hundred pennyworth of bread, and give them to eat?" asked the disciples (Mark 6: 37).

Only one Person, the Son himself, was equal to the occasion. He put the question to Philip: "Whence are we to buy bread that these may eat? And this he said to prove him, for he himself knew what he would do." Philip fell back on earthly calculations, which pre-supposed that Jesus counted for one as powerless as themselves: in bewilderment, he said, "Two hundred pennyworth of bread is not sufficient for them that every one of them may take a little." "There is a lad here," broke in Andrew, which hath five barley loaves [or cakes] and two fishes: but what are these among so many?" What, indeed, if Jesus be not present? O reader, never lose out of view whether he, to whom "All power is given," "both in heaven and in earth" (Matt. 28: 18), is present or absent in your moments of perplexity! "Give ye them to eat," may be an insolvable problem to you; but for him who sends you to some broken-hearted, despairing one, or into circumstances where all seems to go wrong, all is bright as day. He never sends us to a warfare on our own charges, or leaves us any greater responsibility than to trust and obey.

The disciples saw before them the two hundred pence—a mountain of difficulty to very poor men. And then, if the money were forthcoming, where could bread be obtained ready for a meal? and then, if it could be found, how transport it? All was so difficult. Yes, to man. But Jesus knew of other resources. "Make the people sit down;" and the wondering multitude obeyed the obedient disciples: and about five thousand men with women and children were seated, not quite knowing what to expect. Now Jesus looked where he wanted the disciples to learn to look—"up to heaven"—and "blessed and brake and gave the loaves to his disciples, and the disciples to the multitude" (Matt. 14: 19). Why did he, the Son of God, look up? Why did he not, by his own inherent power, perform the miracle? "I can of mine own self do nothing," is the answer. "The Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works" (John 5: 30; 14: 10).

Nothing could be done until the multitude sat down, and until the disciples ceased their attempts to meet the emergency. All the disciples could do was to teach the people to be receptive, by being themselves receptive. It was an act of faith to make the people sit down to be fed, when the visible provision for all this company was only about enough for one person; it was even more an act of faith on the part of the disciples to take that tiny provision into their hands to give to the great multitude. But as the Lord gave to one disciple, enough remained for another; and, as the disciples went on distributing, the same multiplications continued through them to the people.

BUTAIHA, THE SUPPOSED SCENE OF THE MIRACLE

The God of Moses, who had given their fathers to eat the manna in the desert; the God of Elijah's ravens; the God who had made twenty little barley loaves, in Elisha's time, feed a hundred men so that "they did eat and left thereof" (II. Kings 4: 42-44), was present in his Son; would they recognize him? Alas! it was soon to be said of the disciples, "They considered not the miracles of the loaves for their heart was hardened" (Mark 6: 52)! "They were tossed on the sea, distressed in rowing" (Mark 6: 48, R. V.), in trying to deliver themselves, not understanding that the same God who had proved mighty in his Son upon the mountains, was with them on the sea: they could cast out devils, they could preach well, but they showed that they could not live a life of faith in the living God.

The supply was no meagre one, "a little," such as Philip had suggested: "They did all eat and were filled" (Matt 14: 20); "Likewise also of the fishes as much as they would" (John 6: 11). It is ever so that the supply of our Heavenly Father is only limited by our will and capacity to receive. Why should we ever doubt our God? Why should we grumble when he brings us into positions in which he may gain glory by showing what he can and will do in a dilemma of one of his children? All our work for him is worth nothing compared to such opportunities which our faithfulness affords for him to manifest himself.

"And when they were filled, he said unto his disciples, Gather up the fragments [or broken pieces] that remain, that nothing be lost." Oh, how much we may gain through the broken pieces of his revealed truth, which many throw away as unpalatable or indigestible morsels! "They gathered them together and filled twelve baskets with the fragments of the five barley loaves which remained over and above unto them which had eaten:" so far beyond the original five little cakes and two small fishes. When the people saw the miracle they said, "This is of a truth the prophet which should come into the world."

LESSON POINTS

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers

MANY important events occurred between the time of this lesson and that of last week. The other evangelists describe them, but John's purpose in writing his Gospel was not to write a biography of his Master, but from the abundance of biographical material at his command, to select such incidents as would produce faith in Christ. This miracle was one of them. It shows Christ in a very tender light. It displays his compassion and loving thoughtfulness. He who, when hungry in the wilderness, would not work a miracle to provide himself with food, would work a miracle to save other people from fatigue and suffering. It shows, too, the kind of obedience Christ expects from his people. The disciples were to make the people sit down as if for a meal, when there was no adequate provision in sight. That they obeyed, in simple trust in Christ's power, was an indication of faith in him, of no mean order. Another lesson it teaches, is that Christ's work is not alone remedial. In other miracles, he had given healing to the sick, now he gives subsistence to the healthy. The miracle evidently made a deep impression on the disciples, as it did on the public: but while the people were drawn to him merely as a prophet, who could feed them with material food, the disciples recognized in the miracle a proof of his divine mission.

Went up into a mountain. The place was probably that now called Butaiha, which is on the northeastern shore of the lake, and is a quiet, solitary district in which such a crowd could be accommodated. The approach of the Passover, which John mentions, accounts for so large a number being present. Doubtless one or more of the caravans setting out from Galilee to keep the feast at Jerusalem, added to the crowd. John's remark shows that they did not come to be taught, but to see a miracle performed. A teacher less self-forgetful than Christ, might have avoided people who came with so low a motive, but, as we read, he welcomed them. So it has been since. The meals given in our missions, and the food sent to India, in recent times, in Christ's name, went to feed people who did not believe in him, but our Lord's example shows that even people whose [illegible] should not be neglected.

[illegible] cents of our money. So Philip's estimate was that thirty-four dollars would be [illegible] that Christ and his disciples altogether possessed so much. The natural infer[illegible] drew, that the people must buy for themselves. But they had not taken into account what Christ could do. People sometimes forget that, still. In the recent famine in India, the need was so stupendous and the cost of feeding so large a number of persons was so great that it seemed it could not be done. But Christ's spirit was at work among his people, and to this journal alone, nearly $200,000 was sent, besides corn, to meet the need.

Jesus took the loaves. The power that could make these five loaves, which were [illegible] cakes, sufficient for five thousand persons, could have dispensed with the loaves altogether. But that is not Christ's way of working. He expects us to do what we can, and he blesses that beyond our [illegible]. This is the honor and joy of co-operating with him. The story of the first contribution to Dr. Conwell's church in Philadelphia has often been told. A little child, who was unable for some time, to gain admission to the crowded Sunday School, longed to see a large one built that would hold all who wanted to attend. She saved her pennies toward this object. But she was taken ill and died. Her parents told Dr. Conwell of her desire, and gave him her little pocketbook with its contents. There were just fifty-seven cents in it. When the minister told the story, there were many moist eyes in the church, and many a heart was prompted to give. When the subscription list of $250,000 was published, the item at the head of it was this little girl's bequest of fifty-seven cents.

That prophet that should come. No teacher would be so sure of popularity as he who gave his followers food to eat. But that was only a small part of what Christ could do for men. They could work and earn that for themselves, but they could never get food for their souls without his help. A clergyman reaching home after a day spent in pastoral work, was informed that a man who was in great trouble was waiting to see him. In his study he found the man pacing up and down in a state so distracted that he could not speak coherently. The minister thought his trouble was a financial one, and he delicately intimated that he had a small fund from which he could help him. "Money!" exclaimed his visitor. "No, I do not need it. I have plenty. Oh, if it was only that!" Gradually the trouble was explained. It was a story of sin and bitter sorrow. Retribution for wrongdoing had fallen upon him and caused him remorse so poignant that he was contemplating suicide. "What can I do?" he cried as he wrung his hands. "I would give all my fortune to undo what I have done." The minister told him of the blood of Christ which cleanseth from all sin. Together they knelt, to plead its efficacy. As they rose, the sinner felt the sweet sense of peace through believing, and went forth to do all in his power, by a life of service, to show the sincerity of his repentance.

Gather up the fragments. This might have seemed unnecessary where there was One who could so create a provision in any quantity, but Christ wanted no waste. If we were more careful of what we have we could do much more good. The Salvation Army in England is providing work for a large number of hungry men and is producing goods that find a ready sale, simply by gathering up the fragments which are thrown away. The buttons on old clothes, worn tin kitchen utensils, old umbrellas and other articles accounted of no value, are collected by the agents of the Army and are made over at their factories and sold for the benefit of the social work.

. . . A KINDERGARTEN FOR THE BLIND . . .

One of the Novel Philanthropies of Boston — Young Minds Brought from Darkness to Light

BY J. L. HARBOUR

TOMMY STRINGER

OF all the philanthropies of modern times, none have been nobler than that which has had for its object the education of blind boys and girls, and, in some instances, deaf and dumb. Some one has wisely said of this work that it has "added a new province to our wide kingdom of the Spirit." The time has been when a child born blind and deaf, had no hope of being led into the fields of knowledge because there was no system by which it could be taught to read, and become mentally the equal of children who see, and hear, and speak. Now it is not so. A child coming into the world to-day with the three-fold affliction of blindness, deafness, and dumbness, can develop character and intelligence, and a capacity for happiness equal to that of children who can see, and speak, and hear. From its almost animal-like existence it can be brought into a state of the highest and sweetest spiritual perception, and may know God with a spiritual vision keen and clear. There are not many children who come into the world with this three-fold affliction heavy upon them, but blindness is a common sorrow, so common that there are those who, holding their own unspeakable blessing of sight cheaply, look lightly upon it, and give little thought to its full and sorrowful import. But that there are less selfish and more generous and thoughtful souls is evident from the three great buildings of the Kindergarten for the Blind in the Jamaica Plain suburb of Boston. It is the only kindergarten for the blind in America, if not in the world, having its own ground and buildings separate from any other school. Here may be found seventy-five boys and girls under twelve years of age. Many are totally blind, and none of them can see well enough to be educated by any but the system for teaching the blind. Some are deaf and some dumb, but only three of the pupils since the ten years of its existence have come to it deaf, dumb, and blind.

AT SLOYD WORK

Helen Keller has never been a regular pupil of this school, but has spent a number of weeks here as a visitor, and she takes the most intense interest in it, and particularly in Tommy Stringer, the most remarkable blind boy in the world. They who have to do with the blind dwell in a continual moral sunshine, which abundantly repays all the labors undertaken in their behalf.

The Boston kindergarten for the blind is situated in the residence part of one of the most beautiful suburbs of the city. The kindergarten was organized in May, 1887, with ten pupils in attendance in a small building. To-day it has three large four-story buildings besides a large gymnasium, and yet the facilities are inadequate for the reception of all the little blind children who would like to be received into the kindergarten. From a very small beginning it has in eleven years accumulated, in legacies and buildings, property to the value of more than half a million dollars. This is because its work has appealed so directly and so strongly to those sympathizing with afflicted childhood.

TRAINING THE DEAF, DUMB AND BLIND, BOSTON—WILLIE E. ROBBIN, A SECOND HELEN KELLER

The three most noted pupils of the kindergarten have been Edith Thomas, Willie Elizabeth Robbin, and Tommy Stringer. Edith Thomas and Willie Robbin have graduated from the kindergarten and are now at the advanced school for the blind, the Perkins' Institute, in South Boston. Here they are making good progress; Willie Robbin, who is but fourteen years old, being far more advanced in her studies than many seeing girls of her age. She is a singularly beautiful girl of a very lovable disposition and most acute perceptions. Rendered deaf, dumb, and blind by a very severe illness she was brought to the Kindergarten for the Blind in Boston, where she developed into one of its most interesting pupils. Like many of the other pupils, the expense of her education has been met by the gifts of the charitable. Tommy Stringer is now the "star" pupil of the kindergarten. He has a special teacher of his own. He excels in mechanical skill, and his sloyd work is remarkable. This boy, who is entirely blind and deaf, and who is just beginning to learn how to articulate, does work that would be creditable to many a carpenter's apprentice. He knows eight different kinds of wood by their smell alone, and can drive nails as straight as any carpenter. He uses a saw with wonderful precision, and has made several articles requiring the use of twelve different tools. He quickly detects any imperfection in his work and is not satisfied until it is made perfect. He can take a rough pine board and, without any assistance, convert it into a neat letter-box, coat-rack, or shovel. He has made a sled for himself, and is as fond of coasting as any other boy of his years. His articulation is not as distinct as it would be if he made a greater effort to speak, but he very much prefers the sign language, and does not care to talk in any other way.

One cannot visit this noble institution without feeling the truth of the words of one of the speakers at the last commencement exercises of the kindergarten:

"It may seem," he said, "that this work of educating the blind has not any close connection with the great task of reclaiming the world everywhere from its poverty and vice. But think what a challenge this is to workers in every field of charity and reform. This work of educating the blind has made a challenge to all men who work for truth and right everywhere. If one darkened mind can be opened in this way, why not others? If one obstacle can be overcome, why not other difficulties as well? And it is not going to let men rest until a like success is won on all the other fields of effort."

New York's 35,000 Homeless Children

The Berkshire Industrial Farm, formerly known as the Burnham Farm, held its anniversary meeting in the Church of the Incarnation, N. Y. City, recently. Hon. Joseph H. Choate, our Ambassador to England, was one of the speakers. He said that there were 35,000 children in New York State who were dependent on public charity. He thought that those on the Berkshire Farm were in surroundings better fitted to develop the good in them than those in any other institution he had seen.

THE MOTHERS' CONGRESS

To Assemble in Washington this Month to Discuss Many Important Topics

THE National Congress of Mothers will hold its third annual meeting in Washington, from the fourteenth to the seventeenth of February inclusive, and will include on its programme many notable speakers. The Congress will be held in the First Baptist Church. It will open Tuesday, February 14th, with an address of welcome from Mrs. Theodore W. Birney, President, and also from President Whitman, of Columbia University. The response will be made by Dr. Mary Green. Tuesday evening, the president and officers of the Congress will hold a reception. Wednesday morning will be devoted to business, when committees will report the work of the year. Thursday morning will be devoted to the election of officers.

Among the speakers who will read papers and deliver addresses before the convention will be the following: Rev. Hastings H. Hart, Dr. L. Emmet Holt, Dr. Josiah Strong, President of the League for Social Service, New York, Dr. Wm. H. Tollman, New York, Miss Wheelock, Boston, Mrs. Thomas Kirkbride, Philadelphia, Mrs. Herman H. Birney, Prof. Mary Roberts Smith, of Leland Stanford University, Mrs. Joseph P. Mumford, Philadelphia, Prof. Wm. B. Powell, Washington, Miss Edith Westcott, Washington, Dr. G. Stanley Hall, of Worcester, Mass., and others. It is probable that some of the speakers will bring before the Congress practical plans for determining definite lines of work to be followed during the coming year. These plans may be summarized as a platform for wide-spread dissemination among the numerous affiliated clubs throughout the country.

The Gospel in... ...the Carolines

With reference to the possibilities of successful missionary work in the Caroline Islands, The Missionary Review cites one instance in the Ruk group. Mrs. Frances M. Price, of Ruk, says: In Ruk Lagoon are several islands which one year ago had never heard a prayer, and the name of Jesus had never been spoken to them. Just before Christmas they sent for Mr. Price to come and bring them the Gospel. He went: a crowd of naked savages greeted him on the shore. They were kind and attentive, and he left a teacher with them. He went over in two months, and large numbers had put off their heathenism and had put on clothing. He went in May, only five months after the landing of the teacher, and the whole island had renounced heathenism and become nominally Christian. Were they all Christians? No, but they were trying to live pure lives. Christianity changes their hearts as well as the outward life.

What is it that has made the islands of Hawaii what they are? I answer, the Gospel of Christ, carried by the faithful missionaries of the American Board. It is the pure Gospel of Jesus Christ that lifts up, elevates, makes men, and it will do it wherever it goes. Oh, there are grand possibilities for Christian manhood and womanhood in those isles.

The native Christians on Ponape show how they can be true amidst temptation, wickedness and persecution. I ask for nothing better than to carry the Gospel to these little ones whom Christ died to redeem. Oh, ye Christians of America, rise in your might, and help us to spread this blessed, helpful, uplifting, saving Gospel till there shall not be an island in the Pacific where his name is unknown.

Sham Christians

IF a religious society have a thousand members, eight hundred of them are sound asleep. If it have five hundred members, four hundred are lethargic. If the Christians can rally—that is, the professed Christians—for communion day, and succeed in not dropping the wine cup, how many of them are satisfied? If it be a choice between Christ and the world, the world has it. If a religious meeting be on a certain night, and on that certain night there be an extraordinary operatic entertainment, or a social gathering, or a literary club, or a political meeting, or a Free Mason society, or an Odd Fellows' association, you know which they go to. It is there fairly demonstrated that while such professed Christians pretend to be on God's side, they are really on the other side; for there is a point-blank issue between Christ and the world, and the world has it. You know very well that the dividing-line between the church and world to-day is—like the Equator, or the Arctic or Antarctic circle—an imaginary line, and that there are men and women sworn of God who sit discussing infinitesmal questions: "Shall we dance? Shall we play cards? Shall we go to the theatre? Shall we attend the opera?" while there are five hundred millions of the race waiting for the Gospel of pardon and comfort. These sham Christians will go on, occasionally taking a little religion with the tip end of their fingers, sauntering on lazily toward the bar of Christ, until they come in front of God's swift revolving mill, and find themselves to be "the chaff which the wind driveth away." Oh, how much dead wood we have in all our churches!

Sunday Schools Regenerated

THERE has been no more improvement in worldly inventions than there has been improvement in the conduct of religious meetings. The Sabbath School of half a century ago was no more like the Sabbath School of to-day than a canal boat is like a limited express railroad train. But the Sabbath Schools of 1950 will be as much an improvement on the Sabbath Schools of to-day, as those of to-day are improvements upon the Sabbath Schools of 1850. Before Sabbath Schools are what they ought to be, some nuisances will have to be abated. Many Sunday Schools are worn out with story telling. We hear stories told without any application, and many of them chestnuts threshed from trees that long ago rotted down. The children are sick of it. It is one of two things: it is either: "Once there was a little boy," or it is, "Once there was a little girl." And I think George Washington's hatchet has been worn out clear up to the handle; and if that good man could have had any idea how that instrument would have been over-used in our Sabbath Schools, he would have been more than ever tempted to tell a lie and have done with it.

I am acquainted with a lady who wears five thousand dollars' worth of jewelry, while she herself is not attractive, and people look at the jeweiry and not at the lady. And there are teachers who hang around their teaching so much of the jewelry of illustration that the attention of the children is drawn away from the great fact to the mere ornamentation. Now, while story-telling in the Sabbath Schools is very good, there is such a thing as having too much of it.

Neither are our Sabbath Schools intended to be gymnasiums where Sabbath School talkers shall take exercise. There are men who have done grand work by going around from school to school encouraging the superintendents and teachers and classes—men like Ralph Wells and Henry Clay Trumbull and Dr. Vincent. Let their names be in everlasting remembrance! Such men, too, as Pardee—a man who could afford to die in mid-life. He had accomplished the work of half a dozen ordinary lives—work for God and work for the eternal world. But the majority of the men who go around as Sabbath School talkers, making it a regular business, from school to school, are those who are too indolent to take a class in their own church, and who simply go about to maul other Sunday Schools. They remind me of the person of whom I have read—a person who goes about seeking whom he may devour. The superintendent, out of politeness, asks such an one to speak, and as he comes upon the platform I see sticking out of his coat-tail pocket the handle of George Washington's hatchet.

Some one has said that the Sabbath School is a human institution. I prove it is a divine institution from the fact that it has been able to live through all that infliction. Do you know that these peripatetic bores are multiplying? And I call upon the superintendents of the Sabbath Schools to put an end to their ravages. I hear of them in all directions. "Why," you say, "You can't stop them without being discourteous." O, yes, you can be courteous, and yet you can be peremptory: and if you will not say much about it I will tell you a secret. For week after week we had in our prayer-meetings in Brooklyn been pestered by a man who, coming in, would wait until the prayer-meeting was at the climax of interest, and then he would speak and spoil everything. How to get him to stop was the question. I resolved I would endure it no longer, and one Friday night I saw him come in, and I went down to Father Pearson, one of our useful elders, and said to him: "That talking fellow is coming in. Just please go back and tell him that I desire that he never speak here again." Father Pearson rallied all his courage for the unpleasant errand, and went down, and leaned over and spoke to the man. That was the last I ever saw of him. Was I not right it saving the prayer-meeting from such continuous devastation and ruin? Of course I was. Now, I undertake to say that every Sabbath School superintendent is justified in putting bars up around the superintendent's desk, so that any man who cannot interest children, and who cannot interest grown people, shall not have a right there and then to speak. Such persons are very apt to begin by telling how much they love dear little children: but there is something so dry and unnatural in their tone, you suspect right away they are bachelors! They have been around to the conventions, and have gathered up all the facts they can get, and then having begun to speak, you must let them go on, for the bung-hole is unstopped, and the stream will keep running until the barrel is empty! Away with such men from our Sabbath Schools!

Let all the talking, all the singing, all the social influences of our Sabbath Schools point in one special direction, and that the eternal salvation of the children committed to our charge. We must get the lambs into the arms of the Great Shepherd. In order to do this we must believe in the salvation of children. In preparation for communion day, when a little child approaches the officers of the church, and gives his experience, how frequent it is that some good man puts his hand on the child's head, and says: "Well, sonny, I am glad you are here; but don't you think you had better wait?" In other words, let the shepherd go out at nightfall on the mountains and gather in the old sheep, but leave the lanbs outside. Some one coming along will say: "Why do you take in the sheep, and leave this lamb out in the cold?" "O," says the shepherd, "that lamb is not old enough; wait until it grows." I have more faith in the salvation of children ten years of age than I have in the salvation of men forty and fifty years of age. Yet, let three persons come before the official boards of many of our churches, the one ten years of age and another thirty years of age and another sixty years of age, and when you examine the one sixty years of age there will be four questions asked him; and when you examine the person thirty years of age there will be eight questions asked him; and when you examine the person ten years of age there will be fifty questions asked him. Why? Because you have not so much faith in the conversion of children as in the conversion of grown people. Now, I will undertake to say that those who are brought into the Kingdom of God in boyhood or girlhood will be more useful and more faithful. And as to one soul being worth as much as another, I do not believe it. A child's soul consecrated to Christ, living on fifty years in the service of Christ on earth, is worth more than the soul of a man who comes in at fifty years of age, not so much because he has not time to serve God as because he wants to escape the retributions of eternity. I say the soul of that child converted to God will be of more use to itself and more use to the world than the other soul, and therefore I put a higher estimation upon it.

The fact is, we begin too late in the culture of children for God and for Heaven. The world comes along in the April of a child's life and sows tares: the the world comes along in the May of a child's life and sows Canadian thistles. We wait until it is the latter part of August or the first of September, then we come in the field with a great flutter and begin to scatter around the seed of God's Word. Too late! The world is in time. We are too late. The ground is all occupied. The world, the flesh, and the devil have taken full possession. O Church of God, down on your knees, and pray for the eternal salvation of our youth. Then get up and work for the same object. That child has, covered up in the ashes of his body, a spark of immortality which will blaze on with untold splendor long after the sun has died of old age, and all the countless worlds that glitter at night, shall have been swept off by the Almighty's breath, as the small dust of a threshing floor.

The prayers of the readers of this journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its proprietor, and also upon those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ, are printed in it; and that its circulation may be used by the Holy Spirit for the conversion of sinners and the quickening of God's people.

BISMARCK'S MAUSOLEUM

WHEN the great German statesman died, last August, Emperor William proposed that he should be buried with national honors in the new cathedral in Berlin. But Prince Bismarck had selected his own burial place; and his son told the Emperor, with no excess of diplomatic courtesy, that he felt bound to respect his father's wishes. It was easy to perceive in the reports of the Emperor's reception at Frederichsruh, on the occasion of the funeral service, that the deceased statesman's family had neither forgotten nor forgiven the Emperor's treatment of his illustrious servant. It was therefore little likely that they would willingly consent to accept from the Emperor the honor he proposed to pay to their father's remains. They were allowed to have their own way, and Bismarck's body therefore rests in the place he had chosen. On the side of a wooded knoll in the park at Frederichsruh, in the glades of his beloved Sachsenwald, his mausoleum has been erected. It consists of a round tower and a nave. The remains of the Prince and of his devoted wife repose in the tower. The nave is to be used as a burial place for their descendants. This is as Bismarck wished it to be, and evidently his sons sympathized with him. A public funeral and a national memorial are honors that statesmen do not usually despise; but in this case there was doubtless a feeling that the offer of postmortem honor came with a bad grace from the man whose conduct had embittered the statesman's last years. It would have been more humiliating to accept than was the honor which, as Christ pointed out, one generation paid to prophets whom a former generation had killed:

Ye build the tombs of the prophets and garnish the sepulchres of the righteous and say, If we had been in the days of our fathers we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the prophets (Matt. 23: 29).

A Water Curtain

A scientific journal calls attention to a new device for protecting buildings from catching fire from their neighbors. It says that the plan has the endorsement of some of the most experienced professional experts in this line, and is exciting special attention in Chicago, where it is being applied to the great public library building. The arrangement is extremely simple. A seven-inch steel water main is laid around the top of the structure, upon the broad stone table formed by the top of the coping, this pipe having connection with force pumps situated in the basement, and, through perforations properly arranged, insures the introduction of a substantial sheet of water from cornice to pavement, around the whole or any imperilled portion of the building. The arrangement of the system of piping is such as to enable operating in prescribed sections; additional relays of smaller pipe are also placed in position above windows and doors in order to complete the curtaining of those points in the most serviceable manner, should the curtain in the main be broken by any unforeseen accident. How glad Christian parents and friends would be if there were some equally effectual way of preventing the fire of temptation reaching their loved ones from the people among whom they live!

For they sleep not except they have done mischief and their sleep is taken away unless they cause some to fall (Prov. 4: 16).

A Hospital Scandal

A cable dispatch to the New York Herald reports a startling charge against the officials who manage the free hospitals of Vienna. It accuses the doctors of experimenting on the patients in the interest of science. One case is cited of a youth, who was on the way to recovery from the disease, for the cure of which he had been taken to the hospital, being inoculated with the germs of an infectious disease. He died the same day. Another instance is that of a number of women being inoculated with germs, which caused them to endure torture. It is also alleged that the doctors had a number of healthy children from a foundling hospital, on whom they experimented, inoculating them with germs from patients suffering from various diseases, in order that they might watch the progress of the diseases from their commencement. Some American doctors, who know the Vienna hospitals, refuse to believe that the Austrian physicians are guilty of such cruel practices; but Dr. Elwood R. Kerby, of Philadelphia, who studied in Vienna for two years, says that while he was there, "thirty or forty patients, male and female, were inoculated with the germs of a loathsome disease in order that the initial lesion might be studied. They were all very poor people." General indignation is expressed against this heartless method of gaining knowledge of disease and its cure. It was not so that the Divine Physician acquired his power to cure spiritual maladies. "He was made perfect" through his own suffering.

He hath made him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in him (II. Cor. 5: 21).

A Monarch's Vacation

The need of rest and recuperation is felt even by the occupant of a throne.

THE MAUSOLEUM OF PRINCE BISMARCK AT FREDERICHSRUH

The cable brings the news that Oscar II., King of Sweden and Norway, has laid aside the cares of state and has gone to Saltoja-Baden for a complete rest. He has invested his eldest son, the Crown Prince Gustave, with the powers of Regent, to perform the regal functions in his absence. There is little surprise in Europe at the breakdown in the king's health, which has necessitated his temporary retirement. His life for twenty years past has been a harassed one. Though by far the most able and cultured monarch in Europe, a statesman, a scholar, an orator and a poet, all his skill and tact have been insufficient to harmonize the antagonisms of his subjects. Closely resembling one another in language, religion and institutions as do the peoples of Sweden and Norway, they seem unable to work together as a united kingdom. As far back as 1882 the people of Norway gave clear intimations of revival of the old-time jealousy with which they regarded the people of Sweden. The more radical of the Norwegian leaders evidently desired a complete separation and the organization of a Norwegian republic. They demanded a separate Cabinet, the right to arrange their own tariff, and independent consular agencies in foreign lands. King Oscar succeeded in effecting a reconciliation at that time, but the concessions he was obliged to make to preserve the union of the two kingdoms have led to further demands, and have given to the discontented leaders increased power of pressing those demands. The Norwegians have taken a delight in embarrassing the Stockholm government and in opposing its measures. There has been a perpetual struggle between the rival kingdoms and a constant manifestation of ill-will. It was impossible to arouse personal antagonism to King Oscar, for he is a man whose character is above reproach. He and his Queen and their sons are pious and philanthropic to a degree unusual in royal families. They have given many proofs of their devotion to the people, and of their concern for their welfare. But the Norwegians could not be conciliated, and their antagonism is now as bitter as ever. Evidently King Oscar is weary of the vain effort. He is now seventy years old and is broken in health. It is generally believed that his retirement is practically an abdication, and that he will never resume his royal functions. It is well for us that our divine King does not similarly lose patience with his people, who, while professing loyalty to him, antagonize each other and make his prayer of no effect:

KING OSCAR II.

Neither pray I for these alone but for them also who shall believe on me through their word: that they all may be one (John 17: 20).

To Teach Embalming

The opening of a school in New York for instruction in the art of embalming, is announced. Its novelty consists in the fact that a woman is at the head of it, and that she will only take women as pupils. She explains that her purpose is to so qualify a number of women in the grewsome business, that there shall be no longer a necessity for a family to permit the body of a beloved female member of it, to be handled by men, who are often coarse and unsympathetic. She is a Swiss, by birth, but has studied in England, France, Spain and Austria, to perfect herself in her profession of nurse. In the course of her experience in the hospitals, she has witnessed scenes which have impressed her with the need of women embalmers, and she, therefore, devoted some time to the study of the art. She has made new discoveries, and declares that it is now possible by her methods to embalm a corpse so that decomposition is permanently arrested. To do this, it is not necessary to follow the Egyptian method of producing a mummy. She claims that the body, when treated by her, retains its natural appearance, and will continue to do so for an indefinite time. She will, doubtless have many applications for her services. The relatives and friends of the dead are frequently anxious for the preservation of the bodies of their loved ones. To the dead, themselves, it is of no importance what becomes of their bodies. Those who have died in Christ, are assured of a far better habitation for their souls:

For we know that if our earthly house of this tabernacle be dissolved, we have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens (II. Cor. 5: 1).

A Wandering Heir

A lawyer in Niagara Falls, N. Y., has discovered one of the missing heirs to a large fortune, in the person of the driver of a tradesman's delivery wagon in that town. It appears that several months ago, an eccentric old gentleman died in New York, leaving property but no will. It was soon ascertained that only four persons could rank as heirs and one of them was missing. He was a graduate of Columbia College, but for several years he had held no communication with his relatives, and had wandered from one city to another, doing any kind of work that offered. A clue to his present location was found, three weeks ago, by which he was finally traced to Niagara Falls. The young man was found on his delivery wagon and informed of the good fortune that had fallen to him. He was incredulous at first, but his lawyer after visiting New York to verify the news, soon convinced him of its truth. The estate, of which he is entitled to one fourth, is said to be worth at least half a million dollars. He lost no time in presenting his claim, and has already given conclusive proof of his identity. The people to whom the ministers of the Gospel carry the news that they may be heirs of God, do not always find such alacrity in seeking to gain the inheritance, though it is of infinite value.

An inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you (I. Peter 1: 4).

In Peril at Niagara

A narrow escape from a catastrophe is reported from Niagara. A few days ago, while a large number of people were crossing the ice bridge in the gorge at the foot of the falls, the ice started to move slowly down stream. The surface of the bridge became much broken and it was difficult to select a path across. Far out in the centre were a number of boys, and they leaped to shore with wonderful speed. Others near shore got off the moving ice onto that not in motion and hurried to shore. Two men and a woman were on the section that was being carried down stream. It seemed for a time as if they must be lost, but the speed of the ice was checked momentarily by an eddy and they were able to leap to the stationary ice and were saved. It is much to be wished that people who find themselves drifting from their faith, were equally in earnest in trying to get on the firm ground that is near them.

Nevertheless, the foundation of God standeth sure (II. Timothy 2: 19).

TO WORK FOR THE WORLD'S PEACE

Gen. O. O. Howard Proposes Twenty Prominent Americans as a Peace Deputation to Visit Europe—First Steps in a Great International Movement

IT will be remembered by all who take a deep interest in the progress of our race toward peace and genuine fellowship that the Czar of Russia sent out, some months ago, a "Peace Note" to the heads of government of civilized nations. For one, I counted that Peace-Note as a star of promise. The Star of Bethlehem promised "Peace on earth and good-will to men." The results of that moving star no man can estimate. I took it for granted, as doubtless other Christians did, that one of the results of that moving star had found an entrance into the very life-blood of the great potentate himself, who rules over the Russian territory. Motives of interest were imputed to him; for example, his wish to diminish the costs of administration; to relieve the burdens of taxation, and so increase the love and loyalty of his people; to promote industries, especially that of agriculture, by changing, little by little, the soldiers and army followers, and army dependents from absolute consumers to producers; and why not add, to save the lives of vast multitudes of men from idleness, from dissipation, and from death?

The railroad system of Russia, growing day by day, and spreading over almost limitless stretches of domain, opening up fertile regions, and bringing products and markets into conjunction, might well replace a third of the Czar's standing army. The railway discipline in foreign countries exceeds our own. Again, the telegraph lines are obliged to have another multitude of disciplined and trained employees, in order to keep the service at that high standard which will meet the daily wants and demands of enterprise of every sort.

The Czar's Motive As we reflect upon the Czar's "Peace Note" we might agree with those, who love to impute lower motives for the higher, for the conceivable intentions of a ruler or a large administrator of public affairs.

Still, what I have said will suggest that something besides an immense standing army is best for the interests of a country; and however we may read the history of the past, it is not at all strange that an intelligent emperor, whatever his ideas may be of the rights of a monarch, must see the desolating effects of war, and that a nation which keeps too large an army is feeding upon its own vitals, and leading on to ultimate bankruptcy and destruction.

Still another motive, however, was imputed to the Czar, namely, a desire to be abreast of England as far as possible, in all that makes for civilization. The Czar is unwilling that England should have more credit than Russia with other nations, even in helping and caring for mankind. It was claimed that the Queen of England, seeing the constant bones of contention thrown out along the borders of China, where the interests of England and of Russia began to conflict, so deeply in her very soul desired peace, that she wrote a personal letter to the Czar, entreating that matters might be so carefully considered, so thoroughly matured, as to prevent hostile action and secure amicable settlements. It was intimated that she broached the idea of lesser armaments and smaller armies, and diminished appropriations for war and navy. Why keep up a perpetual hostile attitude from the centre to the circumference of every civilized nation! And then, as a logical sequence, the statement came out that the Czar, conforming to the known wishes of Victoria, formulated his wonderful Peace-Note. Even this view of the Czar's motive is not a bad one. Often in life, a great soul is moved by another to form a noble purpose and put the same into execution. But, however this philosophy may find its believers, the simpler theory is that the Czar, who reads the Scriptures and studies the works of thorough Christian men, and sees the constant flowering out of the plants of genuine love and good-will, has himself been born again, and is a simple follower, as far as he well can be in the prison-house of his system of government, of the great Master, the sign of whose coming was the Star of Bethlehem.

An American Peace Deputation You will remember that a deputation came from Great Britain to this country some years ago, many of whom were members of Parliament, and visited Washington. This body came in the interest of settling national difficulties by arbitration. At the time even Christian men were surprised at such a pronounced voice from England. Their statements, petitions and arguments in the interest of peace had a great influence in this country, and produced a profound impression upon statesmen and even politicians. Could we not at this time return the compliment by sending a deputation of our leading men, made up of such names as these:

Hon. Stewart L. Woodford, of Brooklyn.
General Wager Swayne, of New York.
William E. Dodge, of New York.
Morris K. Jesup, of New York.
Robert Treat Payne, of Boston.
Hon. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont.
Charles Dudley Warner, of [illegible].
Prof. Charles F. Olney, of [illegible].
President James D. Angel, of Michigan.
Hon. Henry Hitchcock, of Missouri.
General J. B. Gordon, of Georgia.
Hon. Henry Watterson, of Kentucky.
Hon. John M. Palmer, of Illinois.
Dr. D. K. Pearsons, of Illinois.
General Lew Wallace, of Indiana.
David Starr Jordan, LL.D., President of Stanford University, California.
Mr. R. E. Steele, of Louisiana.
Hon. J. B. Farwell, of Chicago.
H. K. Porter, of Pittsburg, Pa.
Andrew McLeish, Esq., of Illinois.

Lord Salisbury's Attitude This deputation might go authoritatively to England, France, Germany, Austria and other countries of Europe, to give expression to our strong sympathy with the proposals from Russia in the interest of universal peace. A deputation of twenty names, carefully selected, and representing the bona fide sentiment of this country, would have a wonderful effect in securing that Congress of Nations to which the Czar's proposals are tending.

I do hope that the peace note coming from him, may draw together the right sort of convention, and that the results may be far greater than he or Victoria or Christian men generally could have anticipated.

One writer says that the Czar's first document was received "with a good deal of scepticism, not unmixed with derision." His plan was regarded as the impracticable project of a dreamer. All right; that is the way that everything good and great has been received, and it is not less hopeful on that account. Lord Salisbury, however, has suggested obstacles and difficulties attending any plan for disarmament. He suggests that enmities must first be eradicated, because it is the enmities which make the armaments a necessity. There is something in this suggestion, that we, as a people, may well consider. Ever since I can remember anything, there has been, up to a recent period in my circle of acquaintance, more or less distrust of Great Britain; and an indescribable feeling, hardly amounting to enmity, of opposition to England's designs and methods as they have appeared in administration. That general distrust and attitude of opposition has not been altogether wanting in the intercourse of families and of individuals. But lately a great change has taken place. The press of our country imputes good motives to England's public acts; and, on the other side, the press of Great Britain has uniformly sustained us in our late war with Spain, and welcomed us into the family of nations as never before. There is intercommunication in business and in mutual investments, which is so abundant as to indicate positive union. There is also constant immigration and intermarriage; but better than all is the union of Christian men in church interests and in missionary enterprises. International associations have their most abundant showing between Great Britain and America, so that I would say that all phases of public enmity have been swept away and are disappearing in the light and progress of Christian civilization—that civilization which is founded upon the principle of doing unto others as we would have them do to ourselves. There was, however, opposition—we may say controversy—in the newspapers, until the sentiments of the people demanded a change, and the change came in obedience to the popular sentiment. One may put his whole attention upon the sins of a corporation or of a country, and may believe that this whole world is corrupt, but there are mountain-heights from which the universal sunlight can be caught sight of. Vastly more hearts than some of us dream of have been born again, and are filled with the impulse of Christ, and a purpose not to hate but to love a fellow-being. This is why enmities between this country and England have so largely disappeared within a few years.

MAJ.-GEN. O. O. HOWARD, U. S. ARMY

Attitude of Eastern Nations Considering this patent fact, may we not say to Lord Salisbury, probably there is less of enmity between Russia and England—I mean between the people of Russia and the people of England—than he dreams of? Those two nations could disband, pro rata, a large section of their forces, and the people of both nations would applaud. England wants none of Russia, and Russia wants nothing from England. With this attitude of friendship and confidence, other nations would be satisfied. Germany would make no encroachment, and Austria would not attempt to move beyond her boundaries.

The Italians have been worrying under their heavy burden of debt and expenditure. All that Italy needs is simply to disband two-thirds of her standing army. Germany could do the same, and still be strong enough, with her disciplined people, to meet any emergency; and surely France would be glad to enter into such an arrangement of disarmament for the solid benefit of all her people. It would be folly, rather than statesmanship, for Germany and France to quarrel forever about Alsace and Lorraine. The establishment of that border belongs to the past. Men of the present generation had little to do about the matter. And, there is another consideration, and it is this: That in France, and in Germany, the will of the people is now carefully considered, and the will of the people interested would not want their country desolated by war for anything that could be gained by a transference of those two provinces from one free dominion to another. It appears to me that it is more the enmities of dynasties than the enmities of the people who have sustained the dynasties, that keep up such extraordinary, unnecessary, burdensome armaments.

Several suggestions have been made which every promoter of the Christian faith should emphasize, and these suggestions have come from the same source—[illegible] of the Czar at St. Petersburg. One suggestion is a recourse to arbitration. This recourse is always helpful to peace. As we know, it is sometimes impossible to get an arbiter who can deal fairly in a given question, and some questions cannot be submitted to arbitration; but the great majority can be so submitted. A second suggestion is the exemption of private property from seizure on sea and land, in case war does occur. This exemption will mitigate the burdens of war: do away with some of its horrors, prohibit poisoned and explosive bullets, the filling of paths and roads with torpedoes, and such-like efforts to increase the terror and torture of warfare.

Man-Killing Inventions Still another thought we find from the Czar's last explanation, to wit: Stop improvement in the art of war. General Sherman, when discussing the wonderful inventions which have come into play of late years in the art of war, such as rifles and breech-loading cannon, machine guns of all kinds and repeating arms of smaller calibre, with the improvement in explosives and the extraordinary length of range of cannon and small-arms to be used in warlike operations on land and sea, said that this increase of the destruction of human life had changed the nature of warfare, and would doubtless lead to the settlement of national questions more and more by arbitration. If this be true, there would be little gain in undertaking to do what seems thoroughly impracticable, that is, stop inventions. For, as other arts progress, so will that of guns and explosives progress.

The result of these improvements, including communication and transportation, has been to make the modern war bloody enough—but probably not more so than of old—but of comparatively short duration.

The Congress of the Nations However, all peace-loving men will hail with delight a Congress of Nations which will take up the subject of the good of the people and of the settlement of difficulties, as far as possible, without the use of war at all.

We ourselves have been taught a good lesson in the increase of the losses of life the moment our sons are brought into the field as a result of a war, however necessary or excusable that war may be. I rejoice at the tenderness, kindness, and good example of our brave heroes in the last war, but I am sorry beyond expression for the sufferings and death of those who died on both sides. Would God there were some better method of getting rid of lying, extortion, slow starvation, cruelty and murder which has been practiced by some peoples for centuries, without resorting to war. The way appears to me to be to take steps rapidly in the line of Christian education. The disarmament of every Christian nation by a large pro rata reduction will be a lesson in the right direction.

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE

CHILDREN'S DAY IN AFRICA

A Happy Outdoor Time in Midwinter—Rev. G. D. Decker's Work in Freetown, Sierra Leone

FROM Regent Road, Freetown, Sierra Leone, Africa, comes the account of an occasion which is sure to interest the family and home circle. The writer is Rev. George Dove Decker, with whose work in the Dark Continent, our readers already have some acquaintance, as the letter shows. Freetown, though its sanitary conditions have greatly improved of late years, is a hotbed of malaria and fever. It is in that region of Africa known as the "White Man's Grave," and many devoted missionaries have perished in efforts to plant the Gospel there. Our readers will be glad to hear a cheery story from a quarter whence mournful news so often comes. Mr. Decker's picture is not wholly bright, but Children's Day is ever a merry tale. Children's Day in Africa is certainly a novelty; and a novelty which prophetically hints of better things for the Dark Continent:

"Regent Road, Freetown.
Sa Leone, Dec. 5, 1898.

"Editor 'Christian Herald'

"DEAR SIR:—Since the outbreak in our Hinterland, and the general massacre of Sierra Leone traders and European and native missionaries, with the attendant destruction of churches and great trading factories, matters have been in an unsettled state. The government undertook several expeditions to the interior, and most of the rebels were captured and brought to trial. Many imprisonments and wholesale executions followed. Sir Patrick Chalmers, the investigating commissioner whom the British Government sent out, returned to Europe last week, and it is hoped that we may live hereafter in better security as the result of his inquiries.

"I send you a picture of my Sunday School workers and children who took an active part in our last Children's Day Anniversary. Friends came from all parts of the city to witness the exercises, to hear the recitations, and to listen to the beautiful songs which were rendered by some charming voices. The young lady in the centre, with the coronet on her head, is Miss Lavinia Scott, whom we nominated the 'Queen of Children's Day.' She is an excellent girl, and has won many prizes in our Bible class. Just behind her stands a young man who is doing earnest Christian work, and behind him, my son, of whom I am proud to say the same. The gentleman with the full-beard is Dr. Tuelson, our Presiding Elder, to whose warm interest and faithful oversight the district owes so much. On the extreme right, hat in hand, sits Dr. Williams, United States Consul. Standing behind Dr. Tuelson, with the banner in one hand, is Miss Bournes, a songstress whose beautiful voice in solo and chorus added wonderfully to the pleasure of the occasion. I am at the left of the picture, and the young lady at my right was a leading-spirit in the dialogues and speeches recited. Every one of the other girls and boys played faithful and conscientious parts that lovely afternoon in making the occasion a pleasing and profitable one. Since you published my letter and presented the picture of my church in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we have been reminded that we have many kind friends in America.

A "CHILDREN'S DAY" SUNDAY SCHOOL CELEBRATION IN FREETOWN, WEST AFRICA

Children and Cooking

"In our dear old-fashioned country home," says a character in one of Mary Lowe Dickinson's stories from life, "it was mother who cooked the dinner. She taught us spasmodically, to make cakes and pies, but was slow in trusting us to getting a meal alone. Perhaps the fact that father always found it out when we 'meddled' with the cooking, and clearly showed in his face that the best thing we could make wasn't half as nice to him as the poorest of mother's dishes, had some influence in her arrangement of our tasks." It is rather hard sometimes upon father and mother to have to eat the children's dishes, when mother's are so superior; but childhood is usually the happiest period for teaching girls to cook. Cooking is play then. Almost all children love to "meddle" in the kitchen, and it pays to permit them—even if we sometimes have to bestow their experimental concoctions upon the pigs or chickens. We learn to do things best when we love to do them, and "meddling" in mother's kitchen will help Kate and Mary to be good housewives when they come into their own kingdom.

Victoria's Wedding Ring

The "small, thin" wedding-ring of a great queen who has been so conspicuously a good, pious wife and mother may be a matter of interest to many who admire England's aged sovereign. So we give the following letter which lately appeared in The Christian World, London, addressed to the editor:

SIR:—The German artisan, now residing in Philadelphia, is probably the only survivor of the men who worked in the shop in Goswell Road in which the Queen's wedding-ring was made sixty years ago. The late Rev. R. Robinson, for several years secretary of the London Missionary Society, was an apprentice in the jewelry business about that time. Each man and boy there had something to do with its manufacture. It was a small, thin ring, very different from those in fashion now. Each member of the manufacturer's family, of course, "tried it on"—myself among the number, and it remained an interesting tradition with them. The order was given to an English manufacturer by the then Court jewelers, Messrs. Rindle & Bridge, of Ludgate-Hill. I remain, yours truly,

A DAUGHTER OF THE RING-MAKER.

How Ruskin Named the Baby

This great writer (known to many of our girls who have read Sesame and Lilies and Queens' Gardens, and are the better and happier therefor) was very kind to his servants. He took a warm personal interest in all who worked for him, and they, in turn, came to love him. Here is one of many pretty stories told about him and the domestics of his home at Brantwood. One of the maids got married and settled on the estate in a little home of her own. A year later, in one of his long walks in the lovely Lake District, the Professor made a point of calling on her and her husband and congratulating them on a little newcomer. The treasure of the house was proudly exhibited to Ruskin in its downy cot. "What a dear little snowdrop," he exclaimed. Father and mother glanced at each other in delight; a problem which had vexed them and all their relatives was solved; this name and that had been proposed and set aside; there was the very one to fit baby, and "Snowdrop" she was christened.

Little Princes and the Chimney Sweep

One morning (so they say in Berlin) the Empress of Germany encountered a little, sooty chimney sweep in a room of the palace. She nodded to him, told him to stay where he was, went out and hurriedly returned, leading her two youngest children, little Prince and Princess Joachim and Victoria, each bearing a Christmas honey-cake (it was the holiday season), which according to the custom of the country, they offered to the chimney sweep. The grinning little fellow was delighted at the honor done him, and went away from the palace with more lasting tokens of princely favor, but none that he prized more than the honey-cakes—a chimney sweep does not eat honey-cakes every day with a prince and princess.

BE GOOD TO-DAY

BE good to-day to the ones you love.
To-morrow you might be sad
To think of the smile you did not give
To your little lass or lad.

Be good to-day to the ones you love—
Husband, or friend, or wife;
To-morrow the beautiful chance may pass
Forever from your life.

Be good to the ones you love—because
'Tis a blessed thing to be;
'Tis sowing seeds of flowers that bloom
Through all eternity.—GOODLOE HARPER.

Industrial School for Girls

THE New York State Federation of Women's Clubs is taking energetic action to secure the establishment of a Girls' State Industrial School, and have asked the Legislature to pass a bill providing for its creation. A reformatory is not what is intended; about eighty institutions in the State are open to abandoned girls; the Industrial School at Rochester, while admitting these, accepts a better class also. The school proposed will not accept criminals, although girls who are merely wayward or whose parents are irresponsible, will be eligible. It is to be in the country within easy reach of New York City. Its population will be drawn from the tenement districts of cities. A common school course and all trades suitable to women will be taught—special attention being given to domestic arts. Diplomas will be awarded for efficiency in household work, as in other departments, the purpose being to lift domestic labor to the dignity of other trades and professions.

Mrs. Jennie June Croly is the originator of this movement, and the Honorary Chairman of the Committee in charge. Among other prominent women connected with it are Mrs. Clarence Burns, President of the Women's West End Republican Club; Mrs. Theodore Roosevelt, Mrs. Alice Morse Earle, of Brooklyn; Mrs. Edward L. Brackett, of Saratoga; Mrs. M. C. Gownlock, Mrs. W. H. Seward, Mrs. W. G. Humphreys, and Mrs. Max Lanberg, of Rochester.

The ladies who have this excellent work in hand hope to make personal interest in beneficiaries a great factor in their development. Certainly if their plan is carried out, much preventive work will be accomplished, and revenue expended in opening and sustaining the school will be more than saved to the State by decrease in criminology.

Drunkenness Among Children

This most deplorable matter is receiving large attention from people not hitherto interested in the temperance cause. A single issue of any big daily in our large cities often records several cases where children—almost babies—are picked up insensible on the streets and sent to some hospital to be treated for alcoholism. This state of things calls for deep thought, deep prayer, and all possible remedial action on the part of Christian people. Our readers, through their work for our Children's Home, are contributing (for even in winter they do not forget the tenement waifs) to one form of preventive measure. In summer, it transplants little ones from sweltering street and alley into purifying, health-giving influence. Through education and legislation must come the remedial agency which sweeps saloons from our streets.

"A BEAUTIFUL POSSIBILITY"

A New and Charming Serial Story, Written Exclusively for "The Christian Herald"

BY EDITH FERGUSON BLACK

CHAPTER XII

RESTING quietly in happy content, Evadne's thoughts turned to the great quest, which her father's last words had laid upon her. In her illness she had been conscious, as she told Dyce, that she had found Christ; but as yet, like the blind man in the Gospels whose eyes were opened, she discerned nothing clearly. What would Christ be to her now? How would he influence her future life? She lay awake thinking over these two questions.

At length there came a low knock and Mrs. Everidge opened the door.

Evadne stretched out her hands impulsively.

"Oh, this beautiful stillness!" she exclaimed. "In Marlborough there is the clang of the car gongs, and the rumble of cabs, and the tramp of feet upon the pavement, until it seems as if the weary world were never to be at rest; but this house is so quiet I could almost hear a pin drop."

Mrs Everidge smiled. "You have quick ears little one; but we are quieter than usual to-night. Joanna is sitting up with a neighbor, your uncle went to his room early, and I have been reading in mine." She drew a low chair up beside the bed. "Now we must begin to get acquainted," she said.

"Dear Aunt Marthe," cried Evadne. "I feel as if I had known you all my life!"

She gave her a swift caress. "You dear child! Then tell me about your father."

Evadne looked at her gratefully. No one had ever cared to know about her father before. Forgetting her weariness in the absorbing interest of her subject, she talked on and on, and Mrs. Everidge, with the wisdom of true sympathy, made no attempt to check her, knowing full well that the relief of the tired heart was helping her more than any physical rest could do.

"And now, oh! Aunt Marthe, life is so desperately lonely!" she said at last with a sobbing sigh.

Mrs Everidge leaned over and kissed the trembling lips. "Yes," she said, "I know it is very bitter, but there is bitterness in every cup. Our privilege is to extract the sweet from the bitter and I think God is pleased when he sees us do so. If, now that the earthly fatherhood is taken from you, you were to draw closer to the beautiful fatherhood of God, how tenderly he would feel for you! After all, it is best. The most perfect human love never fully satisfies the heart. We never attain the highest and best happiness possible to us until we are folded close in the hush of God's love."

"'The fatherliness of God,'" repeated Evadne, "that sounds lovely—but people do not think of him so. God is some one very terrible and far away."

"'And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes.' Does that sound as if he were far away, little one? 'As one whom his mother comforteth, so will I comfort you.' Why God is father and mother both to us dear child. Can you think of anyone nearer than that?"

Evadne caught her breath in great gladness. "I believe you are his angel of consolation" she said in a hushed voice.

"'I will give unto them a place and a name better than of sons and of daughters'" quoted Aunt Marthe softly. "That means a location and an identity. Here, sometimes, it seems as if we had neither the one nor the other. Christ follows out the same idea in his picture of the abiding place which is being prepared for you and me. Everything on earth is so transitory and the human heart has such a hunger for something that will last."

"Have you felt this too?" cried Evadne. "I thought I was the only one."

Mrs. Everidge laughed. "The only one in all the world to puzzle over its problems? Oh yes, the older we grow the more we find that the great majority have the same feelings and perplexities as ourselves, though some may not understand their thought clearly enough to put it into words."

"What is your favorite verse in all the Bible?" asked Evadne, after a pause.

Mrs. Everidge laughed again, and Evadne thought she had never heard a laugh at once so merry and so sweet. "You send me into a rose garden, dear child, and tell me to select the choicest bloom out of its parterres of beauty. How can I, when every one has a different coloring and fragrance all its own? Two of my special favorites, though, are in Revelations: 'To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna, and will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no one knoweth saving he that receiveth it.' 'And they shall see his face and his name shall be in their foreheads.' That means a possession and a belonging. It is the spiritual symbol which binds us to our heavenly Lover for eternity. Just as the wedding ring is a pledge of fidelity for time. It is only as we see it so that we get the full beauty of the religion of Jesus. His church—the inner circle of his hidden chosen ones—is his bride, and what can be more glorious than to be the bride of the King of kings? The dear souls who only serve him with fear, don't get the sweetness out of it at all. How can they, when their lives are all duty? Perfect love casteth out fear, and there is no duty about it, for when we love, it is a joy to serve and give. It hurts the Christ to have us content to be simply servants when he would lift us up to the higher plane of friendship, when he has put upon us the high honor of the dearest friend of all!"

"Yes, there cannot be any relation so near and dear as a bride," said Evadne.

"But the relation involves a duty, you know. Earthly brides spend a vast deal of time and thought over their trousseau, so I think Christ's bride should walk through the world with a sweet aloofness, while the spiritual garments are being fashioned in which she is to dwell with him. The Bible says a great deal about dressing. 'Let your garments be always white'—the sunshine color, the joy color—for by-and-by we are to walk with him in white, you know. Our spiritual wardrobe must be fitted and worn down here. It is a terrible mistake to put off donning the wedding robes until we come to the feast. And the wardrobe is very ample; Christ would have his bride luxuriously apparelled. 'Be clothed with humility.' That is a fine, close-fitting suit for every day, but over it we are to wear the garment of praise and the warm shining robe of charity. Can you fancy anything more beautiful than a life clothed in such garments as these? And to me the loveliest of all is charity. The highest praise I ever heard given to a woman was that 'she had such a tender way of making excuses for everybody.'"

"Aunt Marthe," said Evadne softly, after a long silence in which they had been tasting the sweetness of it, "I do not need to ask if you know Jesus Christ."

The lovely face took on added beauty. "He is my life," she said.

CHAPTER XI

Elastic Shoe-leather

The sweet freshness of Evadne's new existence was rapidly restoring tone to her mental system, and life no longer seemed a hopeless task. The days were full of dreamy contentment. She spent long mornings under the murmuring pines in the deep belt of forest which stretched for miles behind the house, or helped Mrs. Everidge keep the rooms in dainty order, or drove with her along the grass-bordered roads, while ears and eyes feasted on the symphonies of nature and the ever-changing beauty of the hills; or stood beside Joanna in a trance of delight out in the fragrant dairy, whose windows opened into a wild sweetness of fluttering leaves, and whose cool stone floor made a momentary channel for a purling brook; or watched her, as with dexterous hands she shaped and moulded the bubbley dough, or tossed up an omelet, or made one of her delicious cherry pies, conscious through it all of the sweet influence which seemed to pervade every corner of the house and grounds.

One morning she was resting peacefully in a hammock in the garden, thinking over her aunt's talks, when she heard footsteps approaching. A woman, twenty years her senior, bright, capable, energetic, with a shrewd face and kindly eyes, stood beside her.

"How do?" she said briskly, as she took the chair Evadne offered. "I hope you're feelin' better since you've cum?"

"Much better, thank you. I am sorry my aunt is not at home."

"I am sorry likewise, though it don't make as much difference as it might have done, as I'm callin' a purpose to see you."

"That is very good of you," said Evadne with a laugh. There was a spicy flavor about this child of the mountains which she found refreshing.

"It's a bit awkward," continued her visitor, with a twinkle in her eye, "as we'll have to do our own introducin'. My name's Penelope Riggs—Penel for brevity. What's yours?"

"Evadne Hildreth."

"Evadne. That's uncommon and pretty. I'm going to call you so, if you're not objectionable to it. Life's too short for handles."

Evadne laughed merrily. "I'm not in the least objectionable," she said.

"No, that's a fact," said her visitor, after a moment's kindly scrutiny. "You're true and thorough. I knew I was goin' to like you when I saw you in meetin'."

Evadne flushed with pleasure. "Why that is a beautiful character! I only wish I deserved it. But I fear you are very much mistaken in me, though it is very kind of you to think such nice things."

"Nonsense, child! I don't waste my time thinkin'. Let me have a good look at your face for half an hour, and I'll know as much about you as you could tell me in a week. Malviny Higgins has just come back from Bosting, with her head full of Sykick forces, and mental affinities, and the dear knows what else, but I think it's just a cultivation of our common senses—number, five. You can feel a person without touching them, it's in the air all around you, and you don't need much discrimination to know whether what you say will hurt them or be a blessin'. The main thing is to put yourself in their shoes before you begin to talk."

"Their shoes, Miss Riggs," laughed Evadne; "why they might not fit."

"Penelope," corrected her visitor. "Penel, for brevity. Yes, they will, too, that kind of leather is elastic. It's the old Bible doctrine, 'Never do anything to others that you wouldn't like others to do to you.' If people got the shoes well-fitted before they let their tongues loose, there would be a deal less heart-burn and sorrow in the world."

"Love thy neighbor as thyself," said Evadne slowly: "I never thought of it in that way before."

"Well," said Miss Riggs briskly, "I'm dredful glad you've cum, Evadne. It'll do Mrs. Everidge a sight of good to have you, though Marthe Everidge is raised above the need of humans as far as any mortal can be on this earth. With all their inventions there ain't nobody discovered how to make spiritual photographs yet, or I would have the picture of her character in all the windows of the land. 'Twould do more good than miles of tracts. I agree with Paul that livin' epistles make the best readin', and it don't seem fittin' that she should be shut up in this little place, where only a few of us have the right kind of spectacles to see her through. Most of the folks just allow its Mis Everidge's way, and would as soon think of tryin' to imitate her as a tadpole would a star."

"But we are to imitate Christ," said Evadne.

"'Course, child! But it is dredful comfortin' to have a human life in front of us to show us that that is possible. Lots of times, when life looks like a long seam and the sewin' pricks my fingers, a new light falls on this picture, and I say to myself, 'Penel,' sez I, 'look at Marthe Everidge. The Lord has made you both out of the same material. There ain't no reason why she should be always gittin' nearer heaven and you goin' back to earth as you have, but if she can make every trial into a new rung for the ladder on which she is mountin' up to God, there [illegible] gravestone out of yours to bury yourself under, and so I start on with a new courage, and, when we get to the end of the journey, I'll not be the only one who'll have to thank Marthe Everidge for showin' them the way."

Evadne's eyes shone. "You make me feel," she cried, "as if I would rather live a beautiful life than do the most magnificent thing in the world."

"That's a safe feeling to tie to," said Penelope, with an approving smile; "for character is the only thing we've got to carry with us when we go."

"Well," she continued, "I must be goin'. I did think I'd be homeward-bound callin', but mother's been dredful wakeful lately, an' when daylight comes it don't seem as if I had the ambition in a mess. She don't like to be left alone for a minit to keep up with society." She laughed cheerily as she held out her hand. "Well, I'm dredful pleased to have met you. I'll be more than glad to have you come in when you're down our way."

Evadne watched her as she walked [illegible] Marthe," she said slowly. "I suppose Louis would call it a case of the solanum and the potato blossom, but she is one of the Lord's plants all the same."

"Aunt Marthe, what is culture?" she asked, as later in the afternoon Mrs. Everidge sat beside her. "Is it just the veneer of education and environment?"

"You can hardly call that a veneer, little one. Real education goes very deep. Emerson says, 'Nothing is so indicative of deepest culture as a tender consideration of the ignorant.' I think that culture, to be perfect, must have its root in love. It is impossible that any one filled with the love of Christ should ever be discourteous, or lack in thoughtfulness for the feelings of others."

"Why, that must be what Penelope Riggs meant by her elastic shoe leather," said Evadne with a laugh, and then she repeated the conversation.

"Oh, she has been here! I am glad. It will do you good to know her. She is the cheeriest soul, and the busiest. She always acts upon me as a tonic, for I know just how much she has had to give up, and how hard her life has been."

"Why, Aunt Marthe, she says when she gets to heaven she will have to thank you for showing her the way! She thinks you are perfection."

"Not I, but Christ," said Aunt Marthe.

"Marthe," exclaimed Mr. Everidge, reproachfully, suddenly appearing in the doorway with a sock drawn over each arm: "it is incomprehensible to me you do not remember that my physical organism and darns have absolutely no affinity."

Mrs. Everidge laughed brightly. "If you will make holes, Horace, I must make darns," she said.

"Not a natural sequence at all!" he retorted testily, "when the wear and tear of time becomes visible in my underwear, it must be relegated to Reuben."

"But Reuben's affinity for patches may be no stronger than your own, Uncle Horace," said Evadne mischievously.

Mr. Everidge waved his sock-capped hands with a gesture of lofty disdain. "The lower orders, my dear Evadne, are incapable of those delicate perceptions which constitute the mental atmosphere of those of finer mould. The delf does not feel the blow which would shiver the porcelain into atoms, and Reuben's epidermis is, I imagine, of such a horny consistency, that he would walk in oblivious unconcern upon these elevations of needlework which are as a ploughshare to my sensitive nerves. It is the penalty one has to pay for being of finer clay than the common herd."

The explanation evidently satisfied Mr. Everidge, and he turned and walked self-complacently back to his dressing-room.

"Why does Uncle Horace speak so contemptuously of Reuben?" Evadne asked. "Of course he is poor but he seems faithful. Why does not Uncle take the view you take of other people?"

"Your uncle and I do not look through the same window at these things, my dear."

A MISSIONARY CHURCH

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Feb. 19. Acts 13 : 1-12

ONE cannot but wonder whether those members of the church at Antioch realized the importance and significance of what they were doing. The idea of the true religion being a monopoly of the Jews was so ingrained in the Jewish heart that this mission of Paul and Barnabas must have been extremely distasteful to them, an innovation of a most unnatural, unpatriotic kind. It is true that the missionaries were going to preach to the Jews, scattered abroad, but it must have been foreseen that the end would be preaching to the Gentiles, too. There is only one explanation of their prompt obedience to the Spirit's mandate: the essential spirit of Christianity must have been in their hearts. Where that is, there is inevitably a reaching out, a yearning after souls. Probably the exclusiveness of the Jew was the reason why his religion became the lifeless, formal thing that it was in Christ's time. The tithing of mint and cummin, and the ostentatious prayers had taken the place of true religion, and a man might be very pious and yet devour widows' houses. His religion did not affect his conduct.

We see in the history of the Puritans how this exclusive spirit repressed and poisoned spiritual life. It had no outflow, no room to grow, so it turned to introspection and a morbid dwelling on its own condition. It had, as a historian says, "its finger forever on its own pulse." Or, to use Phillips Brooks' metaphor, "the flood of life being stopped and hindered, flowed back on the soul and overwhelmed it, like the dreary marsh, over which the stagnant water spreads itself, which ought to be energetically pressing out to sea." The church at Antioch doubtless had a stronger, broader life after it sent the two brethren out, to invite others into the kingdom of God. It is in religion, as in social and business life, the liberal soul that is made fat. In Christianity, especially, the exclusive principle is incomprehensible. The essential spirit of Christianity is love for those outside, for the ignorant, the fallen and the miserable. The church that does not reach out to the non-churchgoers around it and to the heathen at home and abroad, proves that it has not Christ's spirit, though it calls itself by his name. Such a church usually perishes, as it deserves, and there is no regret over its extinction. It does not fulfil the purpose for which a church exists, and there is therefore no reason for its being.

The life of a church does not differ from the life of an individual. The converted man who regards his religion as an insurance, and its end to assure his going to heaven when he dies, has missed the true motive of his conversion. God has saved him that he may help to save others, that his light may shine and attract others into the kingdom. So the church that is not aggressive, fails, and it fails even to build up its own piety. It suffers from dry-rot, is stifled and its development is arrested. Such churches usually are concerned about the heathen at home, whom it thinks should be saved before the Gospel is sent to the heathen abroad; but it is a notorious fact that churches which are backward in the support of foreign missions, seldom, or never, do anything for the domestic heathen about whom they profess concern. Christianity is life, expansion, energy, activity. It makes sacrifices. It forgets self and seeks the welfare of others, otherwise it is not the religion of him who took on him the form of a servant that the world might be saved. If the spirit of Christ be in a church, its members may not go out as missionaries, but they will bid godspeed to those who do go, will follow them with their prayers and their gifts, and will undertake joyfully the humbler garrison duty at home. Missionary activity never depletes the energies of a church, but stimulates them for activity in the home field.

AN ENTIRE BIBLE

LIKE great pearls of beauty, its precious words come;
Before them, temptation flies out from the home;
Like bright gold of sunrise they glow on the way,
Where we may walk on without doubt or delay.
Like a fount of clear water, they make green and bright
The hard, dusty way with sparkle of light;
The desert of Struggle, like the rose in its bloom,
Is filled with its beauty and sweet with perfume.
It never can fail to help and to cheer,
The more we shall read it shall grow the more dear.
The Christ has revealed our Father and Friend,
The Comforter, Healer, from heaven to send;
And in the one word brought down from above
Our longing souls rest in infinite—Love.
One thought is the centre of this blessed Book—
It always is there, if we carefully look—
The Christ, the Redeemer with heart full of love,
To bring us at last to his heaven above.
Dear Lord, wilt thou bless thy message each day;
May I live its pure precepts to the end of life's way;
May I rest in its comfort as I lie down to sleep,
And pray to my Father that my soul he will keep?
The dark river of Death becomes in its story
The gold jeweled gate that opens to glory!

FOUND CHRIST IN.... ....THE BOWERY MISSION

A Soul Shipwrecked by Sin Saved by Redeeming Grace

AMONG the numerous testimonies given at the Bowery Mission Gospel services, there have been few that are more instructive or which reveal more clearly a familiar phase of human weakness or a more inspiring story of Divine grace to pardon and save and keep the sinner, than that printed below. It is the frank, outspoken autobiography of P. R. Fay, a redeemed man:

I believe I was the most persistent drinking man I ever saw, because, when I look back over my life, I had no excuse for having become a drunkard. My father was a minister, but died when I was three years old. I had a Christian mother, to whom I used to read the Bible, and I was quite a regular attendant at church. How well I recall her talks and kind advice, warning me against the temptations and vices of the world! But her influence was apparently soon forgotten, for it was not long until I discontinued going to church and began to break the Sabbath by going to theatres and frequenting saloons, and before many months had come and gone, I had acquired a substantial appetite for strong drink. Still, I was prosperous in a way. I seemed to prove rather more than ordinarily apt in whatever position I was placed, but the saloon-keepers got my money nearly as soon as I did, and I was often "broke" two days after pay day, in spite of the $30.00 and better which I used to earn weekly.

Shortly after entering the locomotive department of the C. & N. W. railway, I married a faithful, earnest Christian girl, who made my house all that a comfortable and cheerful home should be, and when I fell into the grasp of King Alcohol for a second time, she did not scold and upbraid me, but plead with me lovingly and kindly, and knelt at my feet and prayed earnestly to God to change my terrible course toward certain destruction. But it seemed as if her pleading and prayers were lost on me in the benumbed and befogged condition into which I was fast sinking. For a time I seemed all right, and if I had then made an earnest appeal to God to give me strength, I would never have become a wanderer and a tramp on the streets of New York.

The day came when my employer informed me that I could no longer be trusted with the management of a locomotive. My friends had been rapidly deserting me. My faithful wife was called to her eternal home, her last words to me being wishes for my welfare. When I came to myself and realized it, it seemed as if the sun had set forever, and I was practically without a hope on earth.

I drifted about in the cities of Milwaukee and Chicago for a year and a half, as nearly useless as a human being could well become. My record had forestalled me everywhere. Finally I climbed aboard an East-bound freight train one dark, cheerless night, and a few days later reached New York. Three weeks later I wandered into the Bowery Mission—on Sunday, Sept. 25th—looking for something to eat, which was given me, and there it was that I saw and heard men standing up and testifying to the wonderful redeeming power of God's saving and keeping them from lives of drunkenness and sin, misery and degradation. This was a wonderful revelation to me. I returned to the evening service, heard more testimonies, and became deeply convicted of sin.

When the invitation was given by Superintendent Wyburn for all who felt their need of a Saviour to come forward, God gave me the courage to go and ask Him for Christ's sake to forgive my sins and take away the terrible appetite for drink. My sins were forgiven; the old desire for rum left me, and I became "a new creature" in Christ Jesus.

I now lack for no good thing which I need. I have health and strength and hold a position of trust and responsibility. I keep my eyes fixed upon Jesus, and daily ask his strength and guidance. Some day I hope to reach that promised land.

Beautiful Old Age

The Hoary Head as "a Crown of Glory"—How to Remain Young When Old—Some Notable Examples—Classic Matrons and "Mothers in Israel"

THE perfect family contains both the old and the young, and the position of the aged in any household ought to be one clothed with respect and surrounded with an atmosphere of serene affection. Yet its claims to this consideration do not come from mere length of days, but from acquired strength of some kind or other—matured wisdom, extensive knowledge, proved virtue, or love that no trial or test could slay. These are the qualities that best adorn old age, and render it worthy of the reverence and affection of the young.

In this era, when everyone can acquire knowledge in childhood, the mere knowledge of experience is not worth what it was in the days of the patriarchs; or even before the era of popular education. The old are not now necessarily wiser than the young—in mere book knowledge they are often inferior—and therefore the reverence due to age must be given to qualities, not to length of days. We can no longer ascribe wisdom to the old, because they are old, any more than we can ascribe piety to clergymen, because they ought to be good. And though in this decrease of reverence for old age, as old age, we may lose some graceful illusions; yet a more truthful understanding of the claims of "age" will bring a more reasonable forbearance, and a far truer sympathy and respect.

The Bible, though insistent on the reverence due to age, does not enforce an arbitrary homage; it declares the hoary head to be "a crown of glory" only "when found in the way of righteousness" and this declaration brings us to the great claim which age has upon the home and the world. If a man of seventy years of age is nothing but the shrunken skeleton of his youth—if he can only fret and moan over his past—if he can teach nothing, because he has learned nothing, what is there venerable in his mere length of days? For "Time itself" is but "a novelty, a late and upstart thing, in respect of the Ancient of Days." He may have lived long, but he has not lived well; for the really fine old man can be a sage among sages, and a youth among the young. The hopeful, joyous spirit of the young acts upon his heart as a magnet; he is immediately susceptible to their influence; he responds with the proper thoughts, he touches the right string, and evokes the best and the gladdest of their sympathy.

For the principle of polarity enters into the finest human characters: and it is to our dual qualities — our power to be old with the old, and young with the young—that we owe the power of fascination. Those who have ever had the pleasure of listening to Faraday talking to the young at the Royal Institute in London, have seen this reciprocal magic of the old on the young, and the young on the old. When on the stroke of sixty-nine, no one listening to his voice, and watching the changes of his countenance, and the promptness of his action, and the charm and delight of the young men and women listening to him, would have believed Faraday to be a day over forty years old. For his spirit animated his flesh, and lightened and lifted it, as the yeast hidden in a measure of flour does. Faraday became eternally young, before he knew he was old. The well-springs of his imagination and his love were too deep for the frost of Age to reach; and his intellect was constantly nourished and renewed by the perennial dews of his heart.

Such men are by no means uncommon, even in the ordinary walks of life. They keep all the surprises and enthusiasm of their youth; and never remind you of their age, because you are arrested by the weft of radiance which their souls throw over the wrinkles on their faces, and the snow on their heads. But this loveliness of Age is from within and not from without; if it is there, a child knows and trusts it; and even a dog, if he be a noble brute, is pervious to its influence. If it is not there, no mechanical effort can assume it; the hard, the cold, and the selfish, are known by its very absence.

Swift said angrily when some one spoke of a "fine old man of ninety," "there is no such thing. If his heart or head had been worth anything, they would have worn him out long ago." But Swift knew that he was doomed to an insane old age, and Goethe, Fleury, Fontenelle, and many living examples, may be cited against this theory. It is not true. The heart and the brain that endure the strongest passions, that have the keenest sense of right and wrong, that know all about the "hate of folly" and the "scorn of fools" keep their youth; they may wear out their clay instrument, but the man within is as keenly alive and alert as John Wesley or George Whitfield were to their last breath; for though "the outward man perishes, the inward man is renewed more and more."

If beautiful old men are not rare personalities, beautiful old women, making age the holy place of life, are still more common. Such women are not much in observation: they do not prowl about the gay places of the world; they are found in the sanctuary of the home. To them come the young with their griefs, and the middle-aged with their perplexities, and none go away uncomforted or uncounseled. If, indeed, aged womanhood was represented by the Miss Crawleys, or the Mrs. Skewtons of fiction, it would deserve all the impatient toleration and contempt given to mere cumberers of the ground. But we have far nobler types—the mother in Israel, the classic matron, the still lovelier grandmother of our Christian firesides; women beautiful in their completed joys and sufferings, who go not into the world, but to whom the world comes.

These beautiful old women are of that noble band born for adversity by this token, that they have conquered it, and can now look backward with thankfulness, and forward with hope. They have lived with "things unseen" as well as with "things seen," and have kept every one of the thousand strings of life's harp in use and practice, and to their bodies Time is one of the gentlest of destroyers, while on their nobler nature he lays only a consecrating, not an erasing, finger. No fears have they to beat away, nor strife to heal: the past is unsighed for, and the future sure.

We may well remember that in traveling to old age, every day is a little life, foreshadowing the whole. We rise in the morning fresh in body and feeling, as a little child. We are middle-aged at noon. We are old and weary at night. Thus, every day is an epitome of life. Old Jacob numbered his life by days, and Moses desired to be taught this holy arithmetic —to be taught to number his days, not his years; and blessed are they who, tarrying in the house of old age, find it a happy sojourning, because they keep in their hearts that sweet promise of the "times of restitution," "the child shall die an hundred years old"—that is, we shall keep our child-heart amid all the cares and sorrows of life, and all the infirmities of age—the freshness and trust—the power to be happy with little, simple things. This is to have the crocus of Spring blossom upon the wintry fields of age.

Finally, Christ has shown us that death is but the sleep of rejuvenescence. It is the great retreat and ingathering of the forces of life, for the greatest transformation. We die that we may be young again. Whenever angels have been seen on this earth, they wore the bloom and aspect of youth, and were seen like unto "young men"; and we shall be like them, for we shall see them as they are. Come then, let us regard the last years of life, not as a period of repose and inactivity, but rather as a time of beginning again—of learning afresh how best to make ready for the new worlds before us. Let us master the fine art of dying well—as great a lesson as the art of living, about which everyone is so busy. Let us learn to take a supple, joyous spirit with us into the great unknown, for doubt it not,

The best is yet to be
The last of life, for which the first was made.

ACROSS THE RIVER

THO' we have a time of sorrow
I will be over by-and-by
There'll be gladness on the morrow,
In the better home on high.
Dear ones now are crossing o'er
To the happy golden shore,
And we shall go to meet them by-and-by.

CHORUS—We shall cross o'er the river,
We shall cross o'er the river,
Where there never shall be sorrow to bear.
O there's life and joy forever,
Just across the rolling river,
And there's everlasting glory over there.

There is music o'er the river;
We shall hear it by-and-by.
Praising him, the great Life-giver,
Where they never more shall die.
We shall join them over there,
And their glory we shall share,
And sing of our redemption by-and-by.

There is love and life and blessing
In that land beyond the sky;
Joy beyond the heart's expressing
Shall be given by-and-by.
When our trials all are done,
And the crown of life is won,
O we shall reign with Jesus by-and-by.

A Dying Waif's First Kiss

Dr. Barnardo, the well-known London philanthropist, and founder of the Barnardo Homes, relates this touching incident in his experience "Teddy, a little street waif, had been picked up in the street dying of pneumonia, and was taken to a hospital. Soon the attendants grew to love the poor, frail little sufferer. One morning he looked particularly ill and weak. The nurse, coming over, caught the wistful look in the eyes of the little waif, who had never known home-life or a mother's love, and irresistibly overcome she stooped down and tenderly kissed the child. Instantly the eyes of the poor boy looked up at her with a wonder greater than he had ever shown. "Nurse," [illegible] "nurse," why did you kiss me?" Before the answer could be given he himself repeated: "Why did you, nurse?" And the good woman, who had been trying to keep the tears back, simply stooped down and whispered to him: "Dear little Ted, you are all alone; you have no mother; you have no one to visit you and to love you. But I love you, that is why—" and she kissed him again. The child's face became irradiated with a light of love, to which it had hitherto been a stranger! But presently the boy, looking at his nurse, heaved a deep sigh. "But—but" (there was a but) "nobody ever kissed me afore," explained the little chap; and then his eyes closed again, and his hands clasped firmly the kind hand of his new-found friend. Little Ted only a few days afterward, closed his eyes wearily forever." There are thousands of just such little, homeless waifs as Ted in our own great city of New York, who sadly need our love and sympathy.

When alum is burnt and ground it makes a white powder which looks similar to a good baking powder. This makes it so dangerous.

The only way to be certain against danger from alum is to make sure that you buy and use the Royal Baking Powder. The Royal is known by every one to be a pure and wholesome grape cream of tartar baking powder. The Government chemists so report, and likewise say it is greatest in leavening strength.

Exiles for Conscience's Sake

Two Thousand Doukhobors from Russia Reach America—A Simple, Excellent Folk—Their Quaint Customs and Earnest Faith

TWO thousand Doukhobor emigrants from Russia arrived in Canada early in January, and more are on the way. In fact a second party of two thousand may already have been landed by the steamer Lake Superior. The steamer Huron brought in the first party, which came from the Caucasian seaport of Batoum. From Halifax they were sent on to Winnipeg, from which point they are being distributed according to the best arrangements that can be made. Canada has given them a kindly welcome, the Government, railway companies, and philanthropic people doing all that is possible to relieve these worthy people who, because of persecution for their religion, found the conditions of life in their native land so intolerable that they petitioned for exile.

This petition was sent to the proper authorities at St. Petersburg, through the mother of the Czar, who became acquainted with their desire while visiting her son in the Caucasus. They asked that they might be permitted to settle altogether in a remote place, or emigrate. The first request was refused, but the latter was granted, on condition that they never again set foot on Russian soil, and that they emigrate at their own expense. The latter condition it would have been impossible for these impoverished people to meet, had not Count Tolstoi interested himself in their behalf and enlisted other friends for them. The proceeds from the sale of a set of his books now being published are donated to them by the author. Through his own efforts and those of Mr. Aylmer Maude, an English disciple, he brought their cause to the notice of the English and American publics, with the result that the Friends Doukhobortsi Committee was formed, and a party of Doukhobors were settled in Cyprus in the Mediterranean. Cyprus was hurriedly, and it seems, not wisely chosen; and preparations, as now made, look to the establishment of all of these people in Canada.

They are extremely desirable emigrants, being moral, industrious, cleanly and peaceable. As excellent agriculturists, accustomed to the exactions of a rigorous climate, they are a boon to Canada, whose resources in many sections are undeveloped for lack of just such settlers. The lands which have been chosen for them are "twelve townships, each six miles square, beautifully situated, and abundantly watered by running streams, with plenty of timber for fuel and building; and soil of the best quality," says a Canadian authority. When the party arrived in Halifax, they were in great need of clothing and blankets. They had left Russia hurriedly, and had brought little with them—indeed, had little to bring. The press and the good people of Canada at once interested themselves in feeding and clothing these strangers within their gates who, through no fault of their own, were in such circumstances. Arrangements were made to house about 900 of the party immediately on their arrival at Winnipeg, in the Immigration Hall at that place; 400 at Brandon, 300 at Dauphin, and others at Yorkton; also, for sending out promptly large bodies of the men to the districts assigned them. Sleighs, oxen and tools are provided for them, and their work will be cutting timber and erecting homes and storehouses in the townships to which their families will be moved in the spring. Work in railway construction will also be supplied to these men for several years to come in their own district.

All who have been connected with the Doukhobors speak well of them. They have been allowed to cook their meals in their rooms at the Immigration Hall, a privilege which is against the usual rule, and have been so exceptionally tidy and conscientious in their use of it, that the management have no reason to regret the indulgence. In the spring the Kars Doukhobors are expected. These have not suffered persecution to the same extent as the Elizavetpol people, of whom present arrivals principally consist, and will be able to meet in part or in whole the expenses of their transportation. When these have come, there will be about ten thousand Doukhobors in Canada.

The sole offence of these people against the Russian Government is that they will not take an oath or go to war; their offence against the Greek Church is Protestantism. Conscription is the rule in Russia, as in other European countries, and will be until men and times are ripe for carrying out the Czar's Peace Proposal. In the meanwhile, the Doukhobors have sought literally to live out the command, "Resist not evil," "Put up the sword," "Let your communication be yea, yea, and nay, nay." When they would not take the oath nor accept the sword at the command of the state, they were moved about from place to place, flung into prisons and their lands confiscated. And they were reasoned with. But fight they would not. The sect started about a century ago among poor, obscure peasants. They called themselves the "Universal Brotherhood Christians;" "Doukhobors" (meaning "Spirit Wrestlers") is the title given them in derision by their Orthodox Greek countrymen. They multiplied, but under the trials through which they have passed the sect has dwindled. They have to a great extent practiced the communal ownership of property. They would plow and mow in common, and the workshops were communal, old and young working in them on equal terms upon tasks of personal or common benefit. When they were banished to the Wet Mountains of the Caucasus, it was expected that the wild hillmen would force them into measures of defence and retaliation. But this was not so; in spite of their own poverty, they helped their neighbors and soon won their respect and good-will. It is to be hoped that they will find in Protestant America, where everyone is allowed freedom of religious opinion, a happier home than they have ever known in their own land.

TO BAR OUT THE POLYGAMIST

A Bill Before Congress to Exclude Brigham H. Roberts from Membership — Petitions Pouring in Against His Admission

FROM every section of the Union, resolutions are pouring in to Congress, protesting, in the name of law, morality and Christian civilization, against the admission of Brigham H. Roberts, the polygamous Congressman-elect, to a seat in the House of Representatives. The widespread publication of Senator Edmund's remarkable letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, has had the effect of deciding public opinion as to the proper course for Congress to pursue.

Congress itself has been stirred to vigorous action sooner than was expected. Representative Clark, of Iowa, has introduced a Bill in the House, intended to prevent the seating of Roberts as a member of the fifty-sixth Congress. It provides that no person, living in or practicing polygamy, shall be eligible to membership of either house, or permitted to hold a seat. Ordinary evidence establishing the fact of his guilt, shall be accepted as sufficient. Congressman Clark will endeavor to have the Bill acted upon promptly by the Judiciary Committee to which it has been referred.

There will undoubtedly be considerable debate over the Bill, on the ground of constitutionality. As Senator Edmunds suggested in his recent letter, the practical method is for the House to exercise its special prerogative of expulsion, rather than to raise the question of the legality of Roberts' election. The House has this power at all times, and under all circumstances which afford provocation for expulsion, it can act without recourse to new legislation.

During the week, many more State legislatures, religious societies and denominational organizations met and adopted resolutions protesting against the admission of Roberts. The Rhode Island Baptists' Association, the Pastors' Association of Chattanooga, Tenn., the Presbyterian, Methodist and Baptist churches of New Jersey and a host of others have adopted resolutions, setting forth that Roberts as "an avowed polygamist, who is breaking the laws of God and of the land," is an unfit person to sit in the halls of national legislation.

Evidences of demoralization in the Mormon church, as the outcome of the Roberts' incident, continue to multiply. All now concede, however, reluctantly, that the nomination and election of Roberts was a cardinal blunder, and that it has been the means of involving the Mormon church in the hottest fight it has experienced in a quarter of a century. Even the leaders are apprehensive of the issue. J. B. Young, one of the most influential sons of the "prophet," Brigham Young, and a strong Mormon, says Roberts should never have been sent to Congress. He adds, diplomatically:

We should accept the law against polygamy, even though it be objectionable to us. Polygamy is only a counsel, and not essential to Mormonism. Many of our members have not several wives; only those who could afford to take care of several, have married more than one. While we dislike the Edmunds' law, the Mormons accept the situation. If my father were living, he would advise submission to the law.

One does not need to go far in search of evidence to demonstrate the absurdity and falseness of the Mormon claim that the leaders and, through their influence, the rank and file, have accepted the Edmunds Law and abandoned polygamy. Two years ago, President Lorenzo Snow, speaking at the funeral of Apostle Abraham H. Cannon, praised him as one "who believed in and lived his religion," meaning polygamy, as the Apostle had taken a fourth wife the year before, and subsequent to the passage of the Anti-Polygamy Law. It has been asserted, without contradiction, too, that the President of the Mormon Church himself (now eighty-four years old), has a young polygamous wife. This unrefuted allegation was made in the Cleveland Leader of December 18, 1898, and is a striking commentary on the recent declaration of President Snow, that there have been no polygamic marriages in Utah since the manifesto of 1890, which ostensibly abolished such marriages.

Governor Heber M. Wells, of Utah, in a recent speech, declared that Roberts should be defeated, and that a vote for him was a vote against the interests of Utah as a State. He warned the people against electing "a man who does not deny that he is living in violation of the laws of the State. If elected, all these facts will be known to Congress . . . I am unable to tell what Congress may do, as to whether he will be elected or not." The warning, however, was unheeded.

THE POWER OF PRAYER

"For when thou pray'st the vision's cleared,
The voice is toned, the will's subdued,
The dear are to thee more endeared,
And the soul's failing strength's renewed.
In prayer the purest words are spoken,
The mind receives heaven's holy light,
The heart is given the Spirit's token,
The hands are charged with wisdom's might.
Therefore, take time to pray."

At the close of a powerful revival meeting in England, recently, a young woman fell on her knees in the presence of a large congregation to pray for the conversion of her parents. After [illegible] Then her sister, kneeling beside her, continued the prayer most effectively. The effect on the congregation was overpowering. The following evening, the parents went weeping to seek a place amongst the people of God.

A clergyman gave the following interesting testimony: In his church a prayer-meeting was held, to which a poor woman brought a written request for prayer for the conversion of a brother. By some means, the request was overlooked. Some time afterwards, this circumstance became known, and the praying people were much exercised on behalf of the woman. It was mentioned in meeting, and all hearts were united in prayer. The man prayed for was at work in a field 250 miles away. There, at that hour, he was brought under conviction, and subsequently became a humble, devoted Christian.

Our Woman's Club

It Discusses Mormonism and the Dangers that Threaten American Homes, etc.

I HAVE always liked the idea of a woman's club big enough to have members in every State of the Union. This is the duty of clubs; and many of you belong to two or three in your own town, and you find that they give you plenty to do; for women's clubs, as I know them, are educational, and lay out courses of study, and keep the mind very actively employed in following them up. But, if you will all join my club, which you can do without any initiation fee, or payment of annual dues, we shall get acquainted with one another, and maybe we will help each other over some hard places, and perhaps, now and then, we may have a little fun; for

A little laughter now and then
Is relished by the best of men.

In this club of mine, if you will kindly let me be its godmother and its president, too, there will be an easy chair and a foot stool for any dear old lady who happens in with her knitting; a low rocker for the business woman, tired out after a long day in the office or the store; a footstool for the schoolgirl, who likes a low seat and a cozy talk; and room enough for everybody, and a chance for every one to express her mind. The topic uppermost to-day in the minds of many of us, is the "Dangerous increase of Mormonism," and on that theme the club will talk informally at its first meeting.

A New York woman is entitled to the floor, as I see her rising.

"Madam President," she says.

"Madam Manhattan."

"I would like to ask the ladies whether there is not a great deal of exaggeration in the accounts we hear of the aggressive character of Mormonism. Aren't we exciting ourselves over a dead issue? Has not polygamy been put down? Do not women vote in Utah? Why should we be disturbed by reports in the newspapers which are no doubt sensational and gotten up for political purposes?"

* * *

Madam New York, having stated her case, resumes her chair, and is followed at once by a member from Massachusetts.

"Madam President!"

"Madam Bunker Hill."

"The friends here may not have given attention to what Mormonism really is. Polygamy is its very foundation-stone. The teaching of Mormonism is that only married women will rise from the dead and enjoy eternal life; that spinsters will perish everlastingly at death. Therefore, Mormon women put aside their natural dislike and aversion to plurality of wives in the home, and encourage their husbands to take as many wives as they choose, thus endowing with immortality each woman entering into the polygamous relations. Another point of belief is that there are crowds of souls in limbo awaiting the hour when bodies shall be provided as their earthly garments, and therefore the Mormon woman approves of an arrangement by which her husband may be the father of numerous children. The whole system is one of shocking depravity, far worse and more depraved than that of Mohammed, not excelled in wickedness by any of the most degraded worships of antiquity. The worship of Moloch and Astarte was not more impure. I cannot see how a woman, honoring herself and caring for the elevation of her sex, can tolerate Mormonism in this Christian land. It is a blot on our escutcheon which should be at once effaced."

Madam Bunker Hill sat down. Instantly the lady from South Carolina was on her feet.

"Madam President."

"Madam Palmetto."

"As the representative in this Assembly of a State which respects the purity of women, regards marriage as binding, frowns upon divorce, and has no toleration for license of any description; as a matron from a brave, and old-fashioned, and courtly State, I wish to add my emphatic commendation to the words of Madam Bunker Hill. We are bound in one bundle in this great country. Shoulder to shoulder, to-day, under one flag, our young men are standing for truth and liberty, and it behooves their mothers and sisters to clear the air they breathe of all miasma. I am informed that the Mormons are sending their missionaries far and wide, that they leave tracts and letters containing Bible texts in the hands of half-taught and ignorant people. If only people would inform themselves, would take the testimony of men who have worked for our Home Missionary Societies in Utah, they would the better discern the peril."

Madam Palmetto ceased.

"Madam President."

It was a sweet-faced, low-voiced woman from Rhode Island who had the floor.

"Madam Roger Williams."

"I agree with the previous speakers that we women of America should fight Mormonism to the last gasp. But there is an evil within our own borders to which we are strangely heedless, most culpably indifferent. It is the proud boast of the lady from South Carolina, and as well of her sisters in Kentucky, North Carolina, Virginia and Tennessee, that divorces are not encouraged by the social public opinion of their communities. Before we throw too many stones at the Mormons I, for one, think we of New England and the Middle States should see what we can do towards tuning up the public conscience on the subject of the permanence of marriage. Young people rush too hastily into matrimony, to repent on too slight occasion. In a recent issue of a daily paper published in New England," said the lady, her countenance very sad, "I counted no less than thirty-two applications from husbands and wives desiring, respectively, release from matrimonial bonds, all in a single court and two adjacent counties. The divorce evil is bad enough among middle-class people; I am told that in ultra-fashionable society it is even worse."

"Madam President."

"Madam Euclid Avenue."

The lady from Cleveland had the floor.

"Let us do justice," she said, "to the poor and lowly. Among them, at least, there is generally a wise acceptance of existing conditions, and a stoical endurance of suffering, which is greatly to their credit. Divorce courts do not flourish in the tenement districts and in the farming communities 'when Betsy and I are out.' They usually keep the fact to themselves. But are we not, as a club, too pessimistic? Let us remember the thousands upon thousands of happily married folk among us, who fear God, bring up their children in thrift and intelligence, pay their taxes, keep the laws and are the saving salt of the earth. As a club, let us look on the sunny side. Madam President, I move that we try, individually and collectively, to scatter sunshine on life's daily path."

"Is this motion seconded?"

"I second the motion," said a lady from Denver.

"It is moved and seconded that as a club and as individuals we shall endeavor to scatter sunshine on our daily path. All in favor will say 'Aye.'"

A chorus of voices gave assent.

"The contrary minded will signify it by saying 'No.'"

Not a single "No" was heard.

"The motion seems to be carried," said the President.

Soon after the meeting adjourned.

THE ORIGINAL....
"ROCK OF AGES"

A Famous Cleft Cliff in Somerset County, England, which Inspired Toplady's Immortal Hymn

THERE are few photographs, outside of those relating to Bible lands, that will possess a greater fascination for Christian readers everywhere than that which appears below. It is a photograph of that wonderful rock in Burrington Coombe, England, which afforded Rev. Augustus Montague Toplady the inspiration which found expression in the imperishable hymn, "Rock of Ages." This is the story of the rock as it appears in Philocophus, a magazine for deaf-mutes, published in Los Angeles, Calif.:

"ROCK OF AGES," AT BURRINGTON COOMBE

The rent cliff, in whose hollow Toplady found shelter from a thunder-storm, is in Somerset county, England

It may interest our readers to know how we happened to get a photograph of this rock and cleft, and the interesting particulars about the author of this famous hymn. Last summer while we were thinking of starting this magazine and looking for something that would prove of interest to the deaf, we read in an English paper that a photograph of the "Original Rock of Ages" had been presented to W. E. Gladstone, who was much pleased with it. We thought it just the thing for our purpose. We felt sure that what would please and interest that great statesman, would also please and interest the deaf, as well as the hearing and speaking people. So we wrote to Sir William H. Wills, telling him what we were going to do, and of our desire to have a picture of the rock in our magazine. We told him the deaf often sang that hymn in the sign language, and it was one of their favorites. Sir William very kindly sent us a copy of the photograph, which we received by mail safely and uninjured.

Dean Defroy, in the Temple Church, London, on May 22, 1898, was preaching a sermon in connection with the death of Gladstone, and in referring to the authors of Gladstone's favorite hymns, spoke of Toplady, "a nonconformist minister," as the writer of "Rock of Ages." Sir William Henry Wills, member of Parliament for East Bristol, England, reading the dean's sermon two or three days after, perceived the mistake, and wrote, telling the dean who Toplady was, and how and where he wrote the hymn. He said: "May I say that Toplady was a clerk in holy orders and never a non-conformist minister? For some years he was curate in sole charge of my parish of Blagdon (County of Somerset) on the Mendips, about eight miles from Wells, and four from Wrington, where Hannah More long resided at Barley Wood. Toplady was one day overtaken by a heavy thunderstorm in Burrington Coombe, on the edge of my property, a rocky glen running up into the heart of Mendip range, and there, taking shelter between two massive piers of our native limestone rock, he penned the hymn, 'Rock of Ages.'

A few years since, my late wife, who knew Gladstone well, sent him on his birthday a good photograph of the rock, to which was appended a copy of his own translation, 'Jesu prome perforatus.'" This letter was sent by Dean Defroy to the London Times, and excited a great deal of interest in the circumstances connected with the first inspiration of this world-famous hymn. The author, the Rev. Augustus Montague Toplady, born in 1740, at Farnham, and ordained to [illegible] was made in charge of Blagdon [illegible] 1768.

Burrington Coombe is in the dark, swelling hill known as Black Down, which rises to the height of 1,100 feet and forms the summit of Mendip range, is within easy reach of Blagdon parish church, the residence [illegible] William Henry Wills's solicitude for objects of archæological interest. It was in Burrington Coombe that Toplady conceived the thought that has immortalized him. At one point there is a conspicuous crag of mountain limestone seventy or eighty feet in height, a prominent object on the right hand to any one approaching from the Blagdon road. Right [illegible] deep fissure, in the recesses of which grows many a fern, while on the hillside around are trees, whose stunted growth and wind worn appearance tell of the scanty soil and the exposed situation.

In this fissure Toplady took refuge from the thunderstorm, and it was this "cleft" and this rock which suggested the central [illegible] of his beautiful hymn. [illegible] publication of his letter, Sir William has received a great many letters from [illegible] Great Britain and [illegible] anxious to know as much as possible about Toplady and "Rock of Ages." The photograph accurately exhibits the appearance of the "Rock."

"Toplady himself died in full and joyous confidence in the 'Rock of Ages,' of which he sang. His [illegible] writes Rev. J. S. Banks, "examining him one day, said, 'Your pulse is becoming weaker.' 'That is a good sign,' said the poet, 'that my death is fast approaching; and I can add that my heart beats every day stronger and stronger for glory.' And when his physician sought to encourage him to believe that he would live some time longer, he replied: 'No, no: I shall die, for no mortal could endure such manifestations of God's glory as I have had, and live.'"

Found Christ on a Mountain Top

Dr. Newman Hall, in his autobiography, relates one of the most interesting incidents of his ministry: "I started one afternoon to sleep on the summit of Snowdon Mountain. When half way up heavy rains fell, and I turned back; but when I reached the bottom the sky cleared and I resumed my climb. I slept on a plank in a wretched little hut. During the night I was charmed by the hymns and anthems of companies of quarrymen who were giving up their rest to see the grand sunrise which their knowledge of local signs foretold. My landlord roused me early, and I sat on the top of the cairn that I might enjoy the phenomenon undisturbed. No words can describe it—the reddening sky, the first level rays goldening a hundred peaks, the shadow of the mountain slowly creeping over the valley, and a score of lakes gleaming in the sunshine! But I was recognized, and entreated to descend from my pulpit and preach to about a hundred Welshmen and a dozen Englishmen. I replied that God was preaching to us, and we had better hear his voice. But I offered prayer, and when I closed several men were shedding tears. The miners, in groups, marched away, singing in their thrilling minor key.

"A year afterwards, when I was knapsacking near Snowdon, a man driving a cart pulled up and asked if he might give me a lift. He had recognized me and, speaking of that sunrise, said it resulted in the conversion of fifty people. He said: 'As they only spoke Welsh, they did not understand a word you said; but the effect was a revival in the village churches near.'"

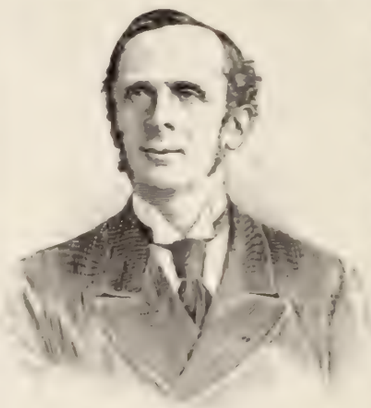
EucalolCuresCatarrh

For twenty-five years the most successful treatment of nasal and throat catarrh has been in the New York and Philadelphia Nose and Throat Hospitals. Years of careful observation and experiment led them to put supreme confidence in the treatment of cleanliness and antisepsis. This they use continually, and this is the Eucalol treatment.



Sir Morell Mackenzie says:

[illegible]

to warm and moisten the air we breathe before it penetrates to the lungs. However dry the air is, it is completely saturated with moisture in passing through the nose passages.

The nose filters from the air dust and disease germs. If the nose is kept in a healthy, moist condition these germs perish, the mucus passages remain healthy and free from [illegible]

Obstruction in the nose prevents the free entrance of air, causes the foul secretions of nasal catarrh, dryness, stuffiness, sense of smell and taste blunted, and breathing through the mouth becomes necessary. Dry mucuous crusts form and have a tendency to become fetid.

The only scientific treatment is an antiseptic treatment to remove these crusts and the accumulated mucus, and the application of the antiseptic Eucalol Emollient. Dry air, vapor fumes, smoke, medicated air and cocaine preparations relieve temporarily and aggravate the disease. Did you ever hear of a physician treating catarrh with such means?

The Eucalol Treatment antiseptically cleanses the nasal passage, and applies the healing antiseptic Eucalol Emollient. We shall continue our

PARTED FRIENDS

MY buried friends can I forget
Or must the grave eternal sever?
They linger in my memory yet,
And in my heart they'll live forever.
They lov'd me once, with love sincere,
And never did their love deceive me;
But often in my conflicts here,
They rallied quickly to relieve me.

I heard them bid the world adieu;
I saw them on the rolling billow;
Their far-off home appear'd in view,
While yet they pressed a dying pillow.
I heard the parting pilgrim tell,
While passing Jordan's stormy river,
"Adieu to earth, for all is well;
Now all is well with me forever."

Oh how I long to join their wing,
And range their fields of blooming flowers!
Come, holy watchers, come and bring
A mourner to your blissful bowers.
I'd speed with rapture on my way,
Nor would I pause at Jordan's river;
With songs I'd enter endless day,
And live with my lov'd friends forever.

TROPICAL FOODS

An Instructive Table for the Use of Missionaries and Others in Warm Climates

ONE of the principal difficulties encountered by the natives of a temperate climate in adapting themselves to the conditions of a tropical climate, is that which relates to the food question. European and American missionaries and others who visit tropical lands, with a view to a longer or shorter residence there, usually find the conditions as to diet exceedingly trying at first. The tropical grains and fruits, so wholly unlike those to which they have been accustomed, are by no means palatable, and serious sickness often follows an effort to adapt themselves to the new regimen. It is, of course, out of the question to live wholly or even largely on imported food, for obvious reasons. At the same time, scientists assure us that the products of the tropics contain, in all particulars, the equivalent of the staple foods that comprise the diet of the average European or American. If our missionaries in the East, and travelers generally, were to make a study of this subject, as well as of other matters relating to food and clothing in the tropics, they might avoid many discomforts; and precious lives, which are often sacrificed through a lack of knowledge in such matters, would be saved to prosecute the Master's work for many years longer.

Mr. T. McKnight is a Christian scientist who has traveled in many tropical countries, and who is now collating for publication a book from the result of many years' experience with the food products of the tropics. He has prepared for the benefit of intending missionaries and others who read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the following list of food products, showing what cereals and fruits produced in hot latitudes are the proper and natural equivalents of the staple foods of colder lands. The table will be readily understood by all who give it a fair examination, and it may be of service to many who are now contemplating service in the tropics.

W. Indies and Central America

TEMPERATE		TROPICAL
Bread.	Its equivalents in character and nutritive quality are	Maize, Guinea Corn, Cassava, Cooking Plantain, Rice.
Beef & Mutton.	Equivalents	Beans, Peas, Peanuts, Fish, Eggs, Fowl.
Potatoes.	Equivalents.	Yam, Sweet Potato, Eddoes, Sweet Cassava.
Butter.	Equivalents.	Cocoa Bean (1-2 butter), Cocoanut (8 per cent), Avocado pear.
Vegetables.	Equivalents.	Eggplant, Okra, Tomato, Squash, Pumpkin.
Fruits.	Equivalents.	Lime, Tamarind, Pineapple, Guava, Watermelon.
Spices.	Equivalents.	Red Pepper, Vanilla, Wild Cinnamon, Pimento, Ginger.

Mr. McKnight explains that lack of familiarity with the character and nutritious properties of tropical products has been a great drawback to strangers in these hot countries, and that there is probably not a solitary product in any part of the globe whose equivalent cannot be found in other parts and under different conditions. Green fruits, etc., are to be avoided. The native cuisine furnishes a hint to the stranger how the unfamiliar products should be treated to secure the best results. With such knowledge skilfully applied, a sufficiency of palatable, varied and nutritious food can be made available at all times, affording strength and nourishment to the stranger, who, without such knowledge, would fare poorly indeed.

PORTO RICO'S... ...FIRST SUNDAY SCHOOL

Opened at San Juan by Our Correspondent, Mr. Frank L. Smith—A Hopeful Outlook

FROM our correspondent in Porto Rico, Mr. Frank L. Smith, of the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A., comes a letter conveying the cheering intelligence that the first Sunday School has been opened in Porto Rico! This will be welcome news to our readers everywhere, and especially to those who have been personally interested in the extension of the Gospel in our new territories and who have contributed to the Porto Rico Sunday School movement. Mr. Smith's letter is given below:

Editor "The Christian Herald":

The mails are very irregular, but THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to January 4th is at hand. This morning I preached to a house nearly full in the large theatre, and we also had a successful Sunday School! A great many soldiers were present. The enclosed leaflet will give your readers an idea of the work. Hurry up the missionaries. There are hungry souls waiting to hear the message in their own language.

A great demand exists for a coffee house for our soldiers. It seems an age since I arrived here, although it is not yet one month; but the need is very great and our soldier boys are being led astray by evil influences. We ought to give them a pleasant place to gather under the auspices of the Army Y. M. C. A.

Captain Charles H. Wyman, the Consular Secretary at San Juan, died on New Years' day, and I was invited to conduct the funeral services. He was a graduate of Yale College, a lawyer by profession, a Presbyterian by denomination, and had been a captain in the Confederate Army. A large circle of friends gathered to pay their respects to his memory. We read the service at the house, and an address was made by Consul Hanna. The body was followed to the cemetery by the male friends, six of whom acted as pall bearers. The cemetery is situated by the seaside, very near the beach, and the natives carried the casket on their heads down the road from the hill. We threaded our way through the little forest of crosses till the side wall was reached where are arranged a series of vaults or niches large enough to contain one body each. Here I read the committal service of the church, and as Consul Hanna dropped the earth upon the casket, while I spoke the solemn words, "Earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust," the eyes of our Porto Rican friends opened in wonder. It was probably the the first Protestant burial service ever held in this Roman Catholic cemetery.

The Royal Mail Steamer, which arrives at Ponce, Porto Rico, will bring Rev. Mr. Caunght to be the rector of the little church located here. From an Antiguan native, we learn that this gentleman came to Antigua with a Mr. Moody about 1889, both of them fresh from college. The latter gentleman soon returned to England, and Mr. Caunght has ever since done faithful missionary work in the West Indian Islands. Our informant says, "He is a God-like man, and from the sermons and life he preached and lived among us, proved himself a Christian man. After a few years' useful and earnest service, he was ordained and became a rector in Nevis. Mr. Caunght came to Antigua by the mail steamer of December 7th, '98, and preached in the cathedral with much acceptance. He looks well but has changed very much in appearance since he first arrived. We welcome him to Porto Rico, and wish him great success in a field now white for harvest." F. L. SMITH.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

S. W. W., Augusta, Me. Is it customary to include in our enumeration of a church's benevolences money given by its members to local institutions, as City Hospital and such like?

It is not. Such benevolences stand by themselves, and should not be credited to church accounts.

R. N. C., Yorktown, Va. In your answer to the question as to the leading inventions and discoveries of this century, you give as one the "Uses of dust." What are the "uses of dust?"

If you will read Alfred Russel Wallace's book, "The Triumphs and Failures of the Century," published by Scribner, New York, you will there find in the chapter he devotes to dust, all the information desired.

F. M. H., Cuba, Ala.; S. H., Schenectady, N. Y., and others. What is meant by the higher criticism?

The criticism which seeks to discover how the books of the Bible were produced, their date, and the circumstances under which they were prepared. There is, as you may be aware, a theory that the original books were edited at various times by later scholars. Such a passage, for instance, as Genesis 36: 31: "Before there reigned any king over the children of Israel," is adduced to show that it was written at a time when there were kings over the children of Israel, and, therefore, by a writer later than Moses. Another theory is that there were books earlier than the books of the Bible, and that extracts from those books were incorporated in the books of the Bible. The higher criticism tries to discover by internal evidence and analysis which parts are extracts and which parts were added by editors. It is called "higher," to distinguish it from the criticism which seeks to get the meaning of the passages.

Robert Newman, Dayton, Ind. Why should ministers of the Gospel expect pay for their labor? Ought they not to give it free for Christ's sake?

Do you not think the laborer is worthy of support? When a man gives his life to ministering to the church, the least the church can do is to provide him with a sufficient income to live upon. If the minister had to go into business or to work as a clerk or on a farm to earn his living, he would not be able to give the time to study which is necessary for the efficient discharge of his duties. As a rule, ministers are underpaid. There are very few of them who could not get more money in secular pursuits. They often do as much work as a physician or a lawyer, and very few of them get more than a bare subsistence.

J. W. M., Pekin, Ia. Who were the officers of the United States that have been impeached by Congress?

The famous impeachment cases were Senator Blount, 1797; U. S. Judge Pickering, New Hampshire, 1803; Judge Peck, Missouri, 1830; Judge Humphreys, Tennessee, 1862; Andrew Johnson, 1868; Secretary of War Belknap, 187[illegible].

L. A. W., Lakeside, N. H. Is there any hope for Dreyfus?

Yes; there is still a prospect that his case on revision may result in his vindication, but the military party in France seems strongly opposed to reopening it.

N. C. H., Duluth, Minn. What education is essentially necessary to become a Congressman? I am nineteen, have a strong ambition to work and study practical things, especially law, but have not the means to obtain a college education, further than having taken a six months' commercial course in a business college. What should I study?

The intellectual equipment of a Member of Congress should be of the very best, if he means to bear a creditable part in the important business of framing national legislation. University training is not essential; but he should be well educated and widely read, and it will materially add to his efficiency if he has studied law and is familiar with the rules of parliamentary debate. History, especially that of his own country; the rise and decline of great political movements; the origin and growth of our national institutions, and the character and function of the various branches of our government; contemporary biography; political economy; the growth of national commerce—these are a few of the many subjects which the young citizen, who desires to take an active part in public affairs, should study attentively. In your own city there are doubtless ample facilities for conducting such studies at little cost. Such books as Bryce's [illegible] rison's Our Country will give valuable suggestions.

C. L. T., Burl[illegible], N. C. Is a man fit to preach the Gospel [illegible] bjects to a man voting as he

That depends on cir[illegible]. If he [illegible] going to vote in a certain way from unworthy motives, he may naturally object and do all in his power to get him to vote in a different way. If you have a very clear and definite idea of what course is best for your State, or for the nation, you would try to win voters to your ways of thinking. That is a patriotic course. There is nothing in that which unfits a man to preach. At the same time you would have no right to prevent a man who is entitled to vote casting his vote according to his conscience. If a minister tried anything of that kind he would be in a bad business.

S. G. H., Seymour, Conn. 1. Has the President free transportation on all railroad lines? 2. How many other officials of the U. S. have free [illegible]

1. It is purely a matter of courtesy on the part of the railroads. 2. None that we know of. The United States Government pays its way. It pays for transportation, mails, troops, supplies and everything, and there is no reason why it should not pay.

C. E. T., Rock Valley, Ia. 1. How did the members of the Sanhedrim get their places? 2. Is there such a thing as a compulsory conversion? Does God ever compel a man to accept Christ?

1. By ordination. Only those were eligible who were fathers of families, who knew some language besides Hebrew, who had served on the local and lesser Sanhedrims. There were seventy-one members, of whom twenty-four [illegible] power of choosing men to fill any vacancy which might occur in its numbers. 2. God never converts a man against his will, but he may use discipline or send him trouble to bring his will into submission. There have been cases in which men have resisted the influence of the Holy Spirit, but have had no peace until they have yielded. Again there are some who, like the Apostle Paul, have been brought to Christ by a sudden revelation [illegible] in some other providential way have been led to give themselves to God. You can scarcely call this compulsion, because at the last the surrender is voluntary, but there are compelling influences in the preliminary experience.

Mrs. Thomas Curtis, Omaha, Neb., is the [illegible] Robert Barker, printer. It contains the Church of England service, prayers for various days and purposes, psalms in metre, two valuable concordances, besides many other features of interest. The Bible is bound in wood, covered with cowhide leather, and is in good condition.

A still older Bible is that owned by Mr. Robert Allan, of Blake, Ont., Can. It was published by Robert Barker, London, in 1616, "translated out of the Greek by Theodore [illegible]."

THE SCHOOLHOUSE IN WHICH THOMAS JEFFERSON STUDIED

In Goochland county, Va., about thirteen miles from the capital, on Tuckahoe creek, is the historic home of the Randolphs. On the east, directly opposite the door of the salon hallway, and at the edge of the expansive old flower-garden, with its boxed walks and queer-shaped beds, stands the small building where Thomas Jefferson, third President of the United States, and Thomas Mann Randolph, as children together, received the rudiments of education and discipline, which finally raised them to the proud political and social elevation of their later years.

Daisy H., Waterloo, Ill. Who wrote the poem "Deeds not Words?" The first stanza is this:

"Not forever on thy knees would Jehovah have thee found;
There are griefs Jehovah sees:
There are burdens thou canst ease:
Look around!"

Possibly some reader may be able to supply the information desired.

H. J. B., Sanborn, N. D. 1. Is it right to compel a person to refrain from working on Sunday? 2. Why is it that a tough young man is often more popular than a young man of good moral life and character?

1. It is always unsatisfactory to use compulsion. It would be much better to convince the man that he is doing wrong and injuring his own soul by working on the Lord's day. You cannot make men good by legislation. If, however, the man makes his work obtru[illegible] man is likely to [illegible] however, the moral [illegible] cented and Pharisa[illegible] manner, but censori[illegible]

Do you know the other verses of this hymn? I would like to teach them to my little boy.

J. D. D., Nichols, Ia., H. A. B., Catherine, N. Y., and others. What is meant by the new theology? What do you mean by a minister not being an evangelical preacher?

When a minister does not make prominent in his sermons the doctrine of Christ's substitution and of justification by faith; when he dwells on Christ's example and regards his [illegible] ted. He does not preach the whole Evangel, the Gospel of "Christ and him crucified." The new theology takes little account of the atonement, does not regard Christ's death as a sacrifice and does not accept the view of its penal character. You will easily see how much difference all this makes in the theological point of view.

Student, Kansas City. What did Jesus mean by saying (Matt. 10: 34) that he did not come to send peace, but a sword?

That strife would be a consequence of his teaching, as it was. You cannot introduce good into the world without evil attacking it. In the next verse he gives instances of the effect of conversion in families. He wished his hearers to understand that if they followed him they would have to meet opposition and must be prepared for persecution. It was not his object to produce strife, but it was the inevitable result of his work.

N. R., Ellenburgh, N. Y. How many scholars were engaged in the revision of the Bible? How many were English? How long did it take? Did any of them die while the work [illegible]

The work of revision commenced in June, 1870. The New Testament Company consisted of twenty-five English scholars and thirteen American. It was completed and published in May, 1881, having occupied nearly eleven years. The revisers sat four days every month, except in August and September. Going over the book once, verse by verse, and considering suggested changes occupied six years. A second course occupied two and a half years more. The remainder of the eleven years was spent in considering the changes proposed by the American revisers and a general revision. The Old Testament Company were fourteen years over their work. They sat for 792 days in all. There were twenty-seven English scholars and fourteen Americans in the company. The number of deaths during the revision were ten of the Old Testament Company and four of the New.

The Picturesque Side of Official Life in Washington—Ministers from Turkey, China, Japan, Siam and Little Korea—Minister Wu and the Bible

WU TING-FANG
The Chinese Minister

PHYA VISUDDHA
The Siamese Minister

JUTARO-KOMUAR
The Japanese Minister

ALI FERROUH BEY
The Turkish Minister

IN the diplomatic corps at Washington the most picturesque element is unquestionably the Oriental contingent. Chief among the members from the Eastern world is the minister from China. Wr. Wu Ting-fang, was born in the city of Hong Kong, and is a graduate from Lincolns Inn Fields, London. He speaks English fluently and is a cultured, progressive gentleman. Mme. Wu is a dainty little lady, whose tiny foot will not measure more than two and a half inches in length, but whose advanced ideas completely upset the preconceived notions of the Chinese women. It has been stated frequently that Minister Wu is a member of the Church of England, but this is not correct. He speaks in the highest terms of the work of the missionaries in China.

WU CHANGCHU
Son of Chinese Minister

"I wish that I could believe in the immortality of the soul and the dogmas of your religion," he said one day to the writer, and there was a sincere earnestness in his voice; "but how do you know that it is true? I've been trying to prove it ever since I heard of it, but how do you know that you have a soul that is to live on in immortality?"

The ladies of the Sabbath Alliance have presented to Mme. Wu a handsomely bound copy of the Bible, and it is to be hoped that within its pages Minister Wu may yet find an answer that will bring his soul into Gospel light and freedom.

The Japanese Minister, Mr. Jutaro Komuar, is a recent addition to the Diplomatic Corps. He was among the first young men who were sent abroad by the Japanese government to be educated. With eight others, he came to America in 1875, and was graduated from Harvard in 1878. On his return to Japan two years later he was appointed to a responsible position in the Judiciary Department of the government, and has since filled several important diplomatic posts. His family did not come to Washington with him, but may do so in the summer.

The Turkish Minister, Ali Ferrouh Bey, has established the Legation of the Sultan on Q street, a door or so distant from the Chinese, and has filled it with many interesting curios from his native land. He is unaccompanied by his wife, and, although he speaks of bringing her over, he is hardly likely to do so, for he is a Mohammedan, and the Mohammedan ladies live in even greater seclusion than their East India sisters.

Korea is another government which owns its Legation property—a four-storied granite residence on Iowa Circle. Minister Chin Pom Ye and suite wear the native dress and adhere largely to the native customs. Neither Mr. nor Mrs. Ye spoke a word of English when they came to Washington, and as for some months Mme. Ye could not speak a word that was understood by any one outside the Legation she must have found it rather lonely; but now she speaks and reads English readily, and seems to enjoy going to social functions, church, and other public places. Like the Chinese dignitaries, they have many friends among the missionaries, but, like them also, they still adhere to the philosophy of Confucius.

MADAME WU, WIFE OF THE CHINESE MINISTER
She is said to be a most progressive, cultured and accomplished woman

The latest acquisition to the corps is from Siam. The new minister, Phya Visuddha, is accredited to both London and Washington, and his first visit to the latter was in December. After a brief stay and a trip out to Chicago, he went back to London, but he is to return in February and to establish the Siamese Legation at the Arlington. He is a Buddhist. Thus all the leading Oriental religions are represented in the Diplomatic Corps.

The children of the diplomats! They certainly deserve a chapter to themselves, such a bright lot of them as they are, from the Portuguese minister's little Maria-Sophia, born in Washington two years ago, to the tall son of the Belgium Envoy who is soon to become secretary of Legation. There are such a lot of them, too, and they cover all ages. Many of these boys and girls, including the Chinese and Korean Minister's sons, are attending the public schools; and some of the smaller ones are going to the kindergartens.

Of all places to see the diplomatic corps in its glory, there is none that equal the President's reception. Then it is that they appear in the full regalia of their court uniformsand dress, and take their places, according to the most rigid law of diplomatic precedence. There are the European, Asiatic and South American diplomats. The dean of the corps greets the President first. He is arrayed in broad-cloth and fine linen; his breast is ablaze with his decorations of honor; over his shoulders he has tied his red sash of knighthood, and in his hand he carries his pointed black chapeau with its long white plumes. The ladies of his family, glittering in silks and diamonds, follow him, and then comes his suite. After them the representatives of the other embassies follow, ranking with due reference to their length of service. Then succeed the minister plenipotentiaries in the same order and just as brilliantly dressed; but it is when the Orientals file past that Solomon in all of his glory is not to be compared to these!

With each one President McKinley and the ladies of the Cabinet shake hands cordially and exchange the greetings of the day. Across the hall behind the famous Tiffany screen, the Marine Band is playing patriotic music, strains of which sweep through the rooms as the pageantry passes by. Over all hangs the heavy odor of the cut-flowers which smile from every mantel, nook and crevice of the beautiful state parlors—a brilliantly interesting spectacle, and one once seen not soon to be forgotten.

Mr. and Mrs. Ye, of Korea, attend the receptions in their narrow silken robes; he with his wide-brimmed, transparent hat, she with her bejewelled head-dress. There is also the Chinese Minister, with his brilliant scarlet-satin surtout and blue-satin skirt; on his head the black cap, with knob of coral indicating his rank. Mme. Wu, patters in after him, in her tiny shoes. She is gowned very like her liege lord, save that from her ears, and on the black velvet band that binds down her smooth hair, gleam clusters of diamonds and pearls. Following, come the twelve secretaries and attaches of the Legation, each in rustling satin clothes. Ali Ferrouh, the Turkish minister, and his secretaries, in cardinal fezzes and gorgeous trousers, come next. Then come the Japanese in shining, patent-leather pomps, high silk hats, and broad-cloth Prince Alberts, with their short little figures, dark skins, and almond-shaped eyes, looking almost as strange in European grooming as their neighbors do in their native Eastern costume.

The Central and South American Republics are fully represented at Washington, and their various Legations support elegant establishments. Minister Carbo, of Ecuador, retains an elaborate suite of rooms at Washington's leading hotel, the Arlington. The Bolivian minister is accredited to Paris, as well as Washington, and is there at present with his family.

During his absence the Legation is maintained at New York City. Minister Merou, of Argentina, has one of the finest libraries in the capital. He is a gifted writer, one of the foremost of his country, and his verses have attracted much attention in the American press. Senore Vicuna, of the Chilian Legation, is also a writer, and in fact almost all of the Ministers of the South American Republics wield their pens with more or less ability.

Lately, Mexico has raised her Legation at Washington to an embassy. Senor Romero has for many years been at the head of that Legation, and he takes his new honors very modestly. But they do not have the attraction for him they would have had last year, for he is in deep mourning over the death of his wife—as sweet and gracious a lady as ever graced the corps.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

Household Annoyances

A Sermon by T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Luke 10: 40, ...

Lord, dost thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone? Bid her therefore that she help me.

YONDER is a beautiful village homestead. The man of the house is dead and his widow has charge of the premises. It is Widow Martha of Bethany. Yes, I will show you also the pet of the household. It is Mary, the younger sister, with a book under her arm, and in her face no sign of care or anxiety about anything. Company has come. Christ appearing at the outside of the door makes some excitement inside the door. The sisters set back the disarranged furniture, arrange their hair, and in a flash prepare to open the door. They do not keep Christ waiting outside until they have newly apparelled themselves or elaborately arranged their tresses, and then, with affected surprise, come out, and pretending not to have heard the two or three previous knockings, say, "Why, is that you?" No, they were ladies, and always presentable, although perhaps they had not on their best. None of us always have on our best; otherwise very soon our best would not be worth having on. They throw open the door and greet Christ. They say, "Good morning, Master; come in and be seated." Christ brought a company of friends with him, and the influx of so many city visitors, you do not wonder, threw the country home into some perturbation. I suppose the walk from the city had been a keen appetizer. The kitchen department that day was a very important department, and I think as soon as Martha had greeted her guests she went to that room. Mary had no anxiety about the dinner. She had full confidence that her sister Martha could get up the best dinner in Bethany, and she practically said, "Now, let us have a division of labor. Martha, you cook, and I'll sit down and learn."

The same difference you now sometimes see between sisters. There is Martha, industrious, painstaking, a good manager, ever inventive of some new pastry, discovering something in household affairs. Here is Mary, fond of conversation, literary, so full of questions of ethics she has no time to discuss questions of household welfare. It is noon. Mary is in the parlor. Martha is in the kitchen. It would have been better for them to have divided the toil, and then they could have divided the opportunity of listening to Christ. But Mary monopolizes Christ, while Martha swelters before the fire. It was very important that they have a good dinner that day, for Christ was hungry, and he did not often have luxurious entertainment. Alas! me! if all the responsibility of that entertainment had rested with Mary. What a repast they would have had! But something went wrong in the kitchen. Either the fire would not burn, or the bread would not bake, or something was turned black that ought to have been only turned brown, or Martha scalded herself, and, forgetting all the proprieties of the occasion, with besweated brow she rushed out of the kitchen into the parlor, perhaps with tongs in one hand and pitcher in the other, and she cried out, "Lord, dost thou not care that my sister has left me to serve alone? Bid her therefore that she help me." Christ scolded not a word. If it were scolding I would rather have him scold me than anybody else bless me. There was nothing acerb in the Saviour's reply. He knew that Martha had been working herself almost to death to get him something to eat, and he appreciated her kindness, and he practically said, "My dear woman, do not worry, let the dinner go: sit down here on this couch beside your younger sister, Mary: let us talk about something else. Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things: but one thing is needful."

As Martha throws open the door, I look in to-day, and I see a great many household anxieties, perplexities, fatigues, and trials, and about them I am going to speak, if the Lord of Mary and Martha and Lazarus will help me by his grace.

As I look into that door, in the first place, I see the trial of non-appreciation. That was what made Martha so vexed at Mary. Mary, the younger sister, had no proper estimate of the elder sister's fatigue. Just as now, men having annoyances of store and factory and shop, or at the stock exchange, come home at night and hear of some household annoyance, and they say, "Oh, that's nothing; you ought to be in a factory a day and have ten or fifteen or twenty or a hundred subordinates. Then you would know something about annoyance and trouble." O man, let me tell you that a wife and a mother has to conduct at the same time a university, a clothing establishment, a restaurant, a laundry, a library, and has to be health officer, police, and president of the whole realm! She has to do a thousand things, and to do them well, in order to make things go smoothly, and that is what puts the awful tax on a woman's nerves and a woman's brain. I know there are exceptions to the rule. Sometimes you will find a woman who can sit in the arm-chair of the library all day without any anxiety, or tarry on the belated pillow, and all the cares of the household are thrown upon servants who have large wages and great experience: but that is the exception. I speak of the great masses of housekeepers, to whom life is a struggle, and who at thirty years of age look as though they were forty. The fallen at Chalons and Austerlitz and Gettysburg and Waterloo are a small number in comparison with those who have gone down under the Armageddon of the kitchen. Go out to the country and look over the epitaphs on the tombstones. They are all beautiful and poetic, but if the tombstones could tell the truth thousands of them would say, "Here lies a woman who was killed by too much mending and sewing and baking and scouring and scrubbing."

The housewife rises in the morning half rested. At an irrevocable hour she must have the morning repast ready. What if the fire will not burn? what if the clock stop? what if the marketing has not been sent in? No matter that: it must be ready at the irrevocable hour. Then the children must be got ready for school. But what if the garments be torn? What if they do not know their lessons? What if the hat or sash is lost? they must be ready. Then you have the duty of the day, or perhaps several days to plan out. But what if the butcher sends meat unmasticable? What if the grocer furnishes you articles of food adulterated? What if the piece of silver be lost, or a favorite chalice be broken, or the roof leak, or the plumbing fail, or any one of a thousand things occur? No matter. Everything must be ready. The spring is coming, and there must be revolution in the family wardrobe, or the autumn is at hand, and you must shut out the northern blast. But how if the moth has preceded you to the chest? How if the garments of the last year do not fit the children now? What if all the fashions have changed?

The house must be an extemporized apothecary's shop or dispensary: there must be relief for all styles of ailments: something to loosen the croup, something to cool the burn, something to poultice the inflammation, something to silence the jumping tooth, something to soothe the earache. O man of business, if you had as many cares as that you would be a fit candidate for an insane asylum! If Martha make, under such circumstances, an impatient rush on the library or the drawing-room, be patient, be lenient. O my sister, though my words may not arouse in many souls any appreciation of your toil, let me assure you, from the kindliness with which Jesus Christ met Martha, that he appreciates all your trials, from garret to cellar, and the God of Deborah, and Miriam, and Abigail, is the God of the housekeepers! George Herbert put the thought in three or four verses, quaint and peculiar, but strong, and in one verse saying:

> The servants of the house are God's delight,
> divine,
> Who sweep a room as for Thy laws makes > this and the action fine.

A young woman of brilliant education and prosperous surroundings was called downstairs to help in the absence of the servant, and there was a ring at the bell, and she went to the door and an admirer entered. He said, "I thought I heard music in the house: was it on the piano or the harp?" She said, "Neither: it was a frying-pan accompaniment to a gridiron! In other words, I was called downstairs to help. I suppose sometime I shall have to learn, and I have begun now." When will the world learn that every kind of work that is right is honorable?

As Martha opens the door I look in and I also see the trial of severe economy. Nine hundred and ninety-nine households out of a thousand are subjected to it, either under the greater or less stress of circumstances. It is especially so when a man smokes expensive cigars and dines at costly restaurants. He will be very apt to enjoin severe economy at home. That is what kills thousands of women—the attempt to make five dollars do the work of seven. It is amazing how some men dole out money to the household. If you have not got the money, say so. If you have, be cheerful in the expenditure. Your wife will be reasonable. "How long does the honeymoon last?" said a young woman about to enter the married state, to her mother. The mother answered, "The honeymoon lasts until you ask your husband for money." "How much do you want?" "A dollar." "A dollar! Can't you get along with fifty cents? You are always wanting a dollar." This thirty years' war against high prices, this everlasting attempt to bring the outgo within the income has exhausted multitudes of housekeepers. Let me say to such, it is a part of the Divine discipline.

Oh, my friends, all these trials and fatigues of home life are to prepare you for heaven, for they will make that the brighter in the contrast! A dying soldier was asked by a friend, "Have you any message to send to your father?" "Yes," said he: "tell him I have gone home." "Well," said the friend, "Have you any message to send to your wife?" "Yes: tell her I have gone home." "You have other friends: would you like to send a message to them?" "Yes, give them the same message: they will all understand it. Tell them I have gone home." And that heavenly home will compensate, will fully atone for all the hardships and the trials and the annoyances and the vexations of the earthly home.

Then, too, it is often not only the toil of the housekeeping, but it is the sickness and the sorrow that go along. It is a simple fact that one-half of the women of the land are invalids. The mountain lass who has never had an ache or a pain may consider household work of no very great weariness, and at the eventide may skip out to the fields and drive the cattle home, and until ten o'clock at night may fill the cabin with laughing racket: but oh, to do the hard work of the household with a shattered constitution—after six weeks' whooping-cough has raged in the household, making the nights as sleepless as the days, then it is not so easy. And then this work of the house has often to be undertaken when the nerves are shattered with some bereavement that has put desolation in every room of the house and sent the crib into the garret, because its occupant has been hushed into a slumber that needs no mother's lullaby. Oh, it was a great deal easier for her to brood the whole flock than to brood a part of them, now that the rest have gone! You may tell her that her departed children are in the bosom of a loving God, but, mother-like, she will brood both flocks, putting one wing of care over the flock in the house, putting the other wing of care over the flock in the grave. Nothing but the old-fashioned religion of Jesus Christ can take a woman happily through these trials. All these modern religions amount to nothing. They do not help. They do not comfort when there is a dead babe in the house. Away with them, and give us the old-fashioned religion of Jesus Christ, that has comforted so many in the days of sorrow and trouble.

Romance and novelty may for a little while seem to be a substitute. The marriage day has only gone by, just gone by, and all household cares are atoned for by the joy of being together, and by the fact that when it is late at night it is not necessary to discuss whether it is time to go. All the mishaps of the newly-married couple in the way of [illegible] are not matters of anxiety or reprehension, but merriment. The loaf of bread turned into a geological specimen, the slushy custards and jaundiced and measly biscuits! Oh, it is a very bright sunlight that falls upon the cutlery and mantel ornaments of a new home! Romance and novelty will do for a little while, but after a while the romance is all gone and there is a loaf to be made, a loaf that cannot be sweetened by any earthly condiments, and cannot be flavored with any earthly flavors. It is the loaf of domestic happiness. All the ingredients from heaven. Fruit from the tree of life [illegible] kingdom, and baked in the oven of home trial. God only can make that loaf. You can cut it, but it takes God to make it.

Solomon wrote out of his own miserable experience—he had a wretched home—no man can be happy with two wives, much less with seven hundred—and out of his wretched experience he wrote, "Better is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox and hatred therewith." Oh, the responsibilities of housekeepers! Kings, by their indigestion, have lost empires, and generals, through indigestion, have lost battles. One of the great statisticians says that out of a thousand unmarried men thirty were criminals, and out of a thousand married men only eighteen were criminals, showing the power of home. And, oh, the responsibility resting upon housekeepers! By the food they provide, by the couch they spread, by the books they introduce, by the influence they bring around the home, they are helping to decide the physical, the intellectual, the moral, the eternal welfare of the human race.

That woman sits in the house of God to-day, perhaps, entirely unappreciated. She is the banker of her home, the president, the cashier, the teller, the discount clerk: and ever and anon there is a panic. God knows the anxieties and the cares, and he knows that this is not a useless sermon, but that there are multitudes of hearts waiting for the distillation of the Divine mercy and solace in their hour of trials and their home duties and their own fatigues. The world hears nothing about them. They never speak about them. You could not with the agonies of an inquisition bring the truth out of them. They keep it still. They say nothing. They endure, and will until God and the Judgment right their wrongs. Oh, but says some sister, "Are you not trying to show that all a woman's life at home is one of self-sacrifice?" Yes, my sister, and that is the only kind of life worth living. That has been the life of Florence Nightingale: that was the life of Edward Payson: that was the life of the Lord Jesus Christ: that is the life of every man or woman that is happy—a life of self-sacrifice. Those people living for themselves—are they happy? Find me one. I will give you all the nations of the earth to find me one. Not happy, no, not happy. It is the self-sacrificing people that are happy, for God pays so largely, so gloriously, so magnificently, in the deep and eternal satisfactions of the soul. Self-sacrifice. We all admire it in others. How little we exercise of it! How much would we endure: how much would we risk for others? How much scourging, how much chastisement, how much anguish will you and I take for others? Oh, that we might have something of the spirit of Jesus Christ: for in all our trades and businesses, and all our life, we are to remember that the sacrifice for others will soon be over.

A GOSPEL SERVICE IN PROGRESS AT THE SHIP MISSION

THERE is in Philadelphia, at the present time, a Gospel Mission which is probably the only one of its kind in the United States, if not, indeed, in the whole world. It is a Gospel ship on wheels; and the story of its origin and of the consecrated labors of which it has been the scene, is one that may well interest and encourage Christian workers elsewhere.

Less than a year ago, a small passenger steamer might have been seen lying at the dock at the foot of Otis street, Philadelphia, on the Delaware. It was used to carry freight and passengers from Philadelphia to Baltimore. Hennings & Co., dealers in engines and metals, bought the vessel for old iron. As she lay there like an old, used-up hulk, it occurred to Mr. Hennings that she might still be put to good service in an entirely different line. For nearly twenty-five years, Mr. Hennings has been a street preacher and evangelist, and in that time he has assisted in opening and establishing several Gospel Missions. Looking over the steamer, he became convinced that, with a little work, a complete transformation could be effected. Accordingly, he had the engines taken out, and set a number of carpenters to work fitting up the cabin and deck with a view to holding Gospel meetings. When all was finished, it was capable of seating an audience of some four hundred people.

Soon the news about the Gospel ship spread throughout the city, and crowds attended the meetings. Mr. James R. Johnston, formerly of the Florence Mission, New York, became his associate and co-worker. An altar was erected on the ship's deck, and around it was grouped a band of workers. Many inspiring and spiritually profitable meetings were held. One evening, the whole crew of a Swedish ship, then in harbor, were at the altar in earnest prayer, calling upon the Lord in their own language. One of the crew, who had been converted, and who could speak English, put his arm about the neck of his comrades, one by one, and directed them in prayer. These men attended the meetings regularly, until their ship sailed.

In March last, the crowds increasing, it was found necessary to make additional provision for their accommodation. A good-sized hall was rented at No. 723 Richmond street, about a block from the dock where the ship lay, and there a spiritual work was begun which was greatly blessed. It was the means of leading many sinners to the Cross.

The Mission hall is near the great shipyards of Cramps, Hillman, and Leavy & Neaffy, and there are a number of iron forges, with hundreds of employees, in the near neighborhood. Many conversions have taken place among these toilers, and the rum traffic in the neighborhood has greatly decreased. Within a year, over 800 persons have confessed Christ and started in the new life. These include heads of families, husbands and wives, sons and daughters, gamblers, drunkards, and sinners of every type. Many broken households have been restored, and the worthlesss and criminal have been led into better paths and to begin law-abiding, industrious lives.

A picturesque feature of the Mission's work is a "Gospel Ship on Wheels," constructed on the model of the vessel on which the Gospel Mission began, and placed upon a wheeled platform and drawn through the streets by four horses, with bells on their necks, inscribed, "Holiness unto the Lord." The strange-looking vehicle was one of the attractions of the recent Peace Jubilee. Within this improvised ship were fifty-two singers. Not only was it in the parade, but after going over a part of the route, the ship was occasionally drawn to port on a convenient corner, and earnest speakers addressed the multitudes, telling anew the story of the "Prince of Peace," to attentive audiences. It would then resume its place in the procession, halting again as opportunity offered. This was kept up throughout the seven miles traveled by the parade that day. Many followed the Gospel ship for miles to listen to the glad message of salvation. After that experience, the "ship on wheels"—as it was called by the people—was used frequently on the streets in the evenings, moving from point to point, and stopping every few blocks to distribute its precious freight of invitation and promise. From its decks, at such times, many saved ones have given voluntary testimonies that have been the means of helping and encouraging the thousands who heard them and of bringing numbers to Christ. A Gospel wagon is also used in the work.

The Mission is supported by the free will offerings of God's people. No collections are taken at the meetings, and no salaries are paid to any of the workers or employees, the janitor of the Mission house alone excepted. Thus far, under Divine blessing, it has been a means of salvation to many, and with that active and cordial co-operation from Christian people which it deserves, it will go on, bringing souls into the Master's kingdom.

The Right Kind of Culture

Culture is all right in its place, writes Evangelist Dwight L. Moody, but to talk about culture before a man is born of God, before he has received this incorruptible seed into his heart, is the height of madness. Suppose I commence the first day of May and plow an acre of ground. The first day I plow it crosswise, and the next day I plow it lengthwise, and every day in the week I plow that acre of land except Sunday. I begin the first day of May, and I plow all through May and June and July. Once in a while I put a cultivator in, and cultivate it, and harrow it, and brush it, and roll it. I have been harrowing, brushing, rolling and cultivating; and you come along and say:

"Moody, what are you doing over there?"

"I am cultivating this acre of land."

"Well, I should say so. I was around here last May, and you were plowing that acre of land. Been at it ever since?"

"Yes."

"What are you going to put in it?"

"Well, I am not going to put anything in it, but I believe in a high state of culture."

You would say I was a first-class lunatic; but that is what is going on all the while in spiritual things.

Put the seed in, and then pray God that the dew of heaven may rest upon it, and you will have some results. There isn't a sower that goes forth and sows that kind of seed, but there will be results.

Aguinaldo at Home

The Renowned Filipino Leader and His Surroundings of Oriental Magnificence

IN a letter to the Illustrated American, I. R. D. Hallowell, a Minnesota volunteer in the Philippines, writes very interestingly of a visit to Aguinaldo at his headquarters at Malolos. He says:

"At either side of the door and up the broad stone stairway were men holding huge spears, the heads of which shone like silver. At the top of the stairs a great surprise awaited me. I was conducted down a large hall furnished with oriental magnificence, and the men here were dressed in superb uniforms. I rubbed my eyes to make sure I was not dreaming—it was all so beautiful. Seated about a door were some fifteen or twenty people awaiting an audience with Aguinaldo. I simply sent in word: 'An American with a communication.' Instantly a man came out, his dress beyond description, and, addressing me in good English, said, 'Walk in, sir.' Again I rubbed my eyes, for I was in a room of enormous size; crystal chandeliers hung from the ceiling; at one end was a piano, and all about were signs of great wealth and even royalty. My escort was most gracious; he was sorry to detain me, but the President had just returned from a three days' trip back in the mountains; he was sleeping, and I must wait until he awoke. He continued: 'We are showing you great honor, as you represent the American Nation. All others we keep waiting outside in the hallway.' I thanked him in the name of Uncle Sam, and settled down for one of the most interesting talks of my life. The man was Aguinaldo's secretary. He said among other things: 'We are grateful to your country for freeing us from Spanish rule. We do not want to fight you. We love and respect you. All we want are freedom and protection. The man sleeping in there is our Washington. Yours made a great nation of you. Ours will do the same for us; but should you hand the islands back to Spain, we will fight to the death.' The time passed all too quickly. Another door opened and another gorgeous creature said: 'President Aguinaldo will give audience to the American,' and I entered what to these poor people is the Holy of Holies. Seated on a sort of throne behind a desk most beautifully carved was Aguinaldo. He arose as I approached, and when within a few feet of him I saluted as to an American officer. He returned the salute and I handed him the communication, withdrawing again a few feet, while he, evidently much excited and still standing, had his secretary read and translate into his own language the contents. All this gave me time to use my eyes, which I did to good effect. First, the man himself. He is very short in stature, with a heavy face, and wearing his jet black hair pompadour. He is only twenty-eight years old and has, like all the natives, copper-colored skin, with smooth face and tiny hands and feet; unlike his attendants, he was simply dressed in a white linen suit. The magnificent desk was covered with a mass of silver articles, all of superb workmanship. The ink-stand particularly was massive. The room was hung in dark silks, over which on the walls were superb shields, daggers and spears all highly polished. A huge globe stood by the side of the desk and many books were about the room.

"After he had perused the message, I withdrew to the former apartment while he dictated his reply. This consumed another half hour, every minute of which I enjoyed, this time being entertained by his nephew, a boy of fourteen years. With the answer in my pocket, I was escorted out of the old convent."

THE SUNDAY SCHOOL

CHRIST AT THE FEAST

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 26. John 7: 14, 28-37. Golden Text, John 7: 37

THE Apostle John has preserved more of the teaching of our Lord about himself than either of the other evangelists. In the previous two chapters we find his teachings at Jerusalem and Galilee about his own vocation upon earth, as the living Word of God, who has life and resurrection in his power, and whose flesh is given for the life of the world. In this seventh chapter we see him again in Jerusalem. For some time he had avoided the holy city, and meanwhile much had happened which we find recorded in Matt. 15-18; Mark 7-9, and Luke 9. Now the feast of the tabernacles was at hand. The persecution of the Lord was not only in Jerusalem, and not only through the critical scribes and Pharisees, but "his brethren," also, of the family of Joseph, made things hard for him.

These men, looking on everything from a human point of view, said to him, "Depart hence, and go into Judea"; from a rejecting Galilee to a rejecting Judea! Everywhere the Saviour of the world was unwelcome; his presence, the light which revealed sin, was found intolerable. "Depart hence and go into Judea, that thy disciples also may see thy works which thou doest. For there is no man that doeth anything in secret, and he himself seeketh to be known openly."

"My time is not come," was the dignified answer of him who was always waiting upon his Father's will, "but your time is alway ready. The world cannot hate you, but me it hateth, because I testify of it that the works thereof are evil. Go ye up unto this feast: I go not up yet unto this feast, for my time is not yet full come." No worldly policy, no human reasoning could move the Son of man. He did not succumb to any influence from without; but did always those things which please God (John 8: 29). How many unripe things, which have had sadly evil consequences, have been done in a hurry! God has a time for everything which he commands his children to do; to know his time and keep time with him is sure success.

Meanwhile, an undercurrent of inquiry and of discussion friendly and otherwise, was going on, but so unpopular was the subject that "no man spake openly of him for fear of the Jews." But suddenly, when men least expected it, Jesus appeared in the temple and taught. "And the Jews wondered, saying, How knoweth this man literature, having not been educated?" It was his Father's moment, and he answered them and said, "My doctrine is not from me, but from him that sent me. He that wisheth to do his pleasure will understand my doctrine, whether it is from God, or whether I speak from my own pleasure. He that speaketh according to the pleasure of his own mind seeketh glory for himself; but he that seeketh the glory of him that sent him is veracious, and evil is not in his heart."

Intellectual power and intellectual reputation were the ideal of the ecclesiastic of those days, as of these. Learned men, whether spiritual or unspiritual, were regarded as men capable of teaching the Word of God, and thus, men who themselves did not know God, assumed the awful responsibility of teaching immortal souls the ways of God, which they themselves had never trodden! It was a direct condemnation of the whole system of theology when Jesus made the knowledge of God to depend upon a surrendered will, and not upon taking a degree in the schools of divinity. And yet how truly the writings of an unlettered tinker like John Bunyan, and the preaching of a shoemaker's salesman like Moody, have done more for the salvation of souls than thousands of intellectual, learned, but unconverted men.

The Pharisees heard that the people were asking, "When Christ cometh, will he do greater miracles than these which this Man hath done?" and they sent officers to take him, but in vain. "Some would have taken him, but no man laid hands on him" (verse 44). The officers returned without him, and when questioned as to why they did not do their duty, they could only say: "Never did a man speak as this Man speaketh." All this time the enmity of the natural heart of man against Christ because of his holiness was coming to the surface. While he was ripening for immolation as the Lamb of God, they were ripening as the instrument through which God's purpose of salvation for the world through that Lamb slain should be accomplished. And all this time our beloved Lord was giving utterance to truths intensely precious to us as we read them in the light of his death, and resurrection and ascension. They were seeking to apprehend him, and he said unto them, "Yet a little while I am with you, and then I go unto him that sent me." They would finally succeed in taking him. He had already on several occasions told his disciples that he should be delivered up, and be killed, but no man should hinder him from rising again. No sealed sepulchre, no keepers could keep him in the grave, the Lord of life and of resurrection; he should go unto his Father. "Ye shall seek me and shall not find me, and where I am, thither ye cannot come." No wonder the Jews were at a loss to understand him: they had not the key of the situation, and unbelieving and misunderstanding disciples could not help them. What might it have been to our Lord in his utter loneliness, if only one of the twelve had really apprehended the truth about his coming sufferings and the glory that should follow! But as yet they were too occupied with the miserable question which of them should be the greatest to perceive the divine realities which were pressing upon him. They knew him very little better than did the hostile Jews!

There was one great fatal lack in them. They had the will, but not the power to comprehend spiritual things, and this very thing was the burden on the heart of Jesus. Thus in the last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus "stood and cried, saying, If any man thirst, let him come unto me, and drink." The source of spiritual life in the believer who has received the Holy Spirit is written where the Spirit dwells: not in the intellect, not in the emotions, not in the natural man. "God is a Spirit, and they that worship him, must worship him in spirit and in truth;" "for the Father seeketh such to worship him" (John 4: 24, 23).

It was the public preaching of what he had taught to the Samaritan woman by the well. There a soul was won, and a messenger of the Messiah made. Here only an impression was made; the people were divided, and taking two sides, disputed between themselves; but neither the one side nor the other yielded to him, and thus they lost the unspeakable blessing of which he was speaking, they did not thirst, and so God, the Holy Ghost, did not come to dwell in them. But was it all in vain? Was nothing gained? When in heathen lands the Gospel is faithfully preached is nothing gained? Yes, thank God, the Word which cannot pass away has been sown.

LESSON POINTS

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers

ONCE more Jesus is in Jerusalem. In this time his fame had gone abroad and his wonders and his teaching were a common topic of conversation among the men who had congregated at the capital, from all parts of the land and from foreign countries.

"Jesus Stood and Cried, If Any Man Thirst Let Him Come Unto Me"

to keep the Feast of Tabernacles. This was celebrated in October, and was in some respects like our own Thanksgiving. Some of the people were inclined to believe in him, being impressed by his miracles; others thought that he did not fulfil the predictions of the Messiah, especially in the fact that his birth and origin were known, whereas the Messiah was expected to appear suddenly and gloriously, without human origin; others, belonging to the priestly and ruling classes, believed him to be a dangerous agitator, who should be suppressed, even by execution if there was no other way. While the disputes between these classes were in progress, Jesus suddenly rose in the Temple, and, before the assembled people, uttered the words which form the subject of the lesson. It was true, he said in effect, that his origin was known, but his divine commission had not been recognized. The reason of this was that God himself, who had sent him, was not [illegible] had come to reveal him. Finally, turning from these insincere quibblers, whose eyes were so fixed on the letter of God's word that they could not understand the spirit, he cried to the earnest souls who really desired spiritual life: "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink." That is still the condition of securing the blessing. His [illegible] and the self-righteous get no good from Christ; but the humble, earnest seekers find in him a satisfaction for all their longings.

I know him. The expression is that of a son or of a friend who pays no attention to slanders or charges of wrong doing. A child at school receives a letter from his father, which he is just able to spell out. He does not quite understand it, and some one attempts to explain it to him, as some critics try to explain God's Word to his people. The child listens, and, as he perceives the meaning put upon the letter, replies: "No; my father does not mean that. I am not quite clear what he does mean, but I know him to be just and kind and loving, and therefore he does not mean what you say." Or, someone is told that a friend has committed forgery, and the evidence is spread before him. He brushes it aside with contempt. He says: "You could never convince me of his guilt, because I know the man and know that he could never be guilty of the crime. You do not know him, otherwise you would not entertain the charge." If these people had known God, they would not have rejected Christ who came from him.

Ye shall seek me and shall not find me. Seeking Christ may be postponed until it is too late. This, not because of any change in Christ—he is always ready to bless the seeker—but because of changes in the seeker. A wealthy merchant, in his old age, was besought by a Christian friend whom he had known in his youth to seek Christ. "I cannot," he said. "I do not know how it is, but all desire for salvation is gone from me. I have listened to eloquent preachers; I have argued with myself; but it is useless. I suppose I have neglected the thing so long that the inclination is gone from me." An eminent surgeon, who was about to perform a critical operation, said to the students who were watching him: "As you know, there is very little chance of the patient's life being saved, but this is the only hope. Two years ago a very slight medical attention would have cured him. One year ago a comparatively safe operation would have saved him, but he has neglected his condition too long."

Let him come unto me. That is the only way to get effectual help. A poor victim of the morphine habit went to a specialist to be cured. "I can cure you," said the doctor, "on one condition: you must come to me for a month and obey me implicitly." The victim consented. One day he was begging and pleading for just one syringe full of the drug. "You can have all you want," the doctor said, "by leaving my house." But that was not what the sufferer wanted. He said: "Don't give up my case, doctor; all my hope is in you. Let me have this one dose and then go on with the cure." But the doctor was firm. He was willing for the man to leave, but he would not permit him to return to the drug while under his care. Christ saves no one against his will, but he will save the worst case if the sinner will come to him and give his case into his hands.

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE

The Influence of Habit

All-important in Childhood for Developing Pure and Noble Character

MANY a man owes his reclamation from sin, to the little prayer said in childhood, night after night, at a mother's knee.

Our great cities are thronged with young women, battling with the world for a living, and knowing no home influences save those found in the passing population of a boarding-house. A lady spending a night with one of these young women, was inexpressibly touched when the girl (worldly enough on the surface) knelt down and said her prayers, and then said, with a shame-faced look: "I can't help doing that—I did it so much when I was little. And sometimes—I'm awful glad I can't help it, for it's the only link between me and home-life." Talking on, she said: "There are several things mamma taught me that it's fortunate I can't help doing. She used to talk the day's events over with me when she put me to bed. If I had been naughty, we had it all over with, and I could make a fresh start next day. She taught me that God heard and knew all about it—was interested in my affairs. And I have that feeling now; and each day I make a fresh start. Somehow that habit keeps me hopeful and strong, and helps me wonderfully." Little did that faithful mother realize the wall of protection and defence she was building around her daughter!

"The way to root out, or prevent bad habits is to grow good ones so thick and fast that the former find no room in which to thrive," writes an authority on child-culture. Experience shows that good habits are as easily formed in childhood as bad. One of the prettiest pictures at THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home each summer is the twilight hour, when in the dusk of the dormitories, a multitude of soft voices murmur in unison "Our Father." Many children in after years continue that custom of evening prayer, as well as other good habits acquired at the Home. Every little life that has come within the sweet and orderly influences of the Home will doubtless respond in various ways through all coming years. If so much can be promised and prophesied of temporary influences, what may we not assure ourselves for our own children, that we may mould them into pure, noble and helpful lives.

The Father in the Family

It is impossible to overvalue the mother's place in forming the character of the child. "There is," says Hamilton Mabie, in The Kindergarten Review, "serious danger that the place and opportunity of the father may be overlooked. As a rule, the American father is generous to a fault with his children; he is eager to give them every opportunity for growth, pleasure and success. He spends his strength and surrenders his time gladly, that he may maintain an ample home and command the resources of wealth, school, travel and congenial surroundings. He becomes a tireless wage-earner; he insensibly transfers to his wife the shaping and molding of the life of his children, the making of the atmosphere of the home, which is more important in its searching and formative influence, than any other element in the family life; he opens doors through which his children pass into larger fields of knowledge, but he does not guide them. He is, unconsciously, substituting a lower for a higher service, and in his passionate desire that his children shall have the best things, he is denying them the noblest gift he has to bestow—himself."

Japan's Little Weavers

At Sakai, and some other Japanese towns where carpets and rugs are woven only in handlooms, children, from seven years upward, are the chief workers; and it is said that some 18,000 are thus employed, each working about twelve hours daily and receiving a penny each for such service.

The weaving is set to quaint music, a certain tune meaning a certain pattern. When the woman in charge of a loom changes the tune she is humming, the little workers instantly change the pattern to suit the music. They speak of "one tune," "two-tune," "four-tune" carpets, certain products of the loom being perfectly known to them by such descriptive term.

The Ex-President's Home

The hearts of the American people have followed Mrs. Cleveland into her Princeton home. Her true womanliness had endeared her to the nation; and then the Cleveland children are really "our babies;" so we have a right to "look after them" a little, as it were. Westland, the Cleveland home at Princeton, is a charming place, and through the courtesy of master and mistress it is a very attractive one for the university boys. It is said that Mrs. Cleveland has made for herself "a place in the Princeton undergraduate heart that no other woman was ever known to have." Also, that:

The Cleveland children are almost as well known to Princetonians as the father and mother themselves. Scarcely a day passes but what the three little girls, Ruth, Esther and Marion, with their governess, drive by the university campus in their little dog cart. They are also seen on the streets quite frequently, walking with their governess or with one or both of their parents. Master Richard Folsom Cleveland is not yet so well known to the Princetonian, but even he is now beginning to venture out in the open occasionally. All the little girls are bright and attractive looking.

Nature Studies for Children

The New York State Science Teachers' Association, which meets annually in Columbia University, recommended that nature studies be given a more prominent place in our public schools, both grammar grades and high schools, and "that all tests of the quality of the work shall not be less severe than those applied in mathematics and Latin." "Science work" brings children in closer relationship with nature, makes them understand her better, inculcates reverence for her methods, makes them see that she is God's handmaid, and that a divine spirit of love and wisdom is operating to bring forth blades of grass, buds and blossoms, bees and birds. The recommendation that nature studies be given as much prominence as mathematics and language, is a wise one. What we call nature is really one of God's languages. Nature studies will take the little folks on excursions to field and parks, and be good for them in many ways. Any plan which gives city children a chance to breathe pure air, see flowers, and hear bird-songs, is a blessed one.

AT BABY'S CRIB

"GOOD night, dear. Baby is going to sleep
In his little cot soft as down:
And mamma beside it vigil will keep,
'Till baby is off to Slumberland Town."

Heavy his eyelids, dreamy his eyes
Like unto blue flowers half-blown:
But "Seepy?" O no! and he tries to look wise.
To "Seepy" what baby will own.

Then mother says over "Our Father," and he
On his way to Slumberland fair,
Softly and faithfully—sleepily—
Lispeth the beautiful prayer

"Our Faver," drooping, his eyelids close:
"In Hebben," he murmurs again.
And safely baby to Slumberland goes
On the music of that refrain.

Only a Smile

IT was only a smile as she passed along,
But it made a weary heart more light;
More strong to wait with hope renewed
'Till the way should seem more bright

It was only a smile to a little child
Trudging along to school one day;
But it made his lessons seem less hard,
And it cheered his little way.

It was only a smile for the patient horse,
A smile, and a soft caressing touch;
But the old horse whinnied his kindly thanks,
And his load seemed lightened much.

It was only a smile for a poor old man,
Who had asked for alms, she had none to give.
But she gave a smile, and he murmured low,
"God bless you and let you live!"

It was only a smile on a woman, bent
By many a burden which left its trace
On her weary form; but it seemed to her
'Twas a smile from an angel's face.

It was only a smile from her humble pew
In church, which she sought tho' the storm was wild;
But the pastor was helped by her smiling face,
And prayed, "God bless the child!"

It was only a smile when her heart was sad,
A smile, and a prayer that she might do good.
But others seeing her calm and brave,
Watched her and understood.

Child-Saving

AT the recent convention, in New Orleans, of the National Prison Reform Association, extraordinary emphasis was given by all the speakers to preventive work—Child-Saving. One evening at Tulane Hall, was devoted to addresses on this subject by Rev. Beverley Warner, Dr. R. C. Buckner, of Texas, and Hastings R. Hart, Secretary of the Child-Saving Association of Chicago. Mr. Hart gave an interesting narrative of the work of that association in behalf of the homeless children and children of the slums. Mr. Hart advises the removal of little unfortunates to country or village homes, rather than the housing of them in crowded city institutions. He also says that the adoption of homeless children into childless homes is becoming a more practical and popular measure of relief than it once was. Dr. Warner said, that although the work of the Association was for the reformation of the criminal, society owed it to itself not to delay ministry until that point was reached. He said:

If we can get at the children of the slums—it is being done here and elsewhere—if we can get them out of the atmosphere of everlasting poverty and blight and darkness (there are hosts of children who may be reached at least once a week); if we can so reach them, there is hope for them. If we take, for instance—I have seen this—little children who never knew clean face or hands into the companionship once a week of ladies, and so show them clean hands and faces which are kindly, we are leading them somewhat into the way of making men and women of them.

A remarkable illustration of kindergarten results, in San Francisco, is shown by the records kept by "the children's friend," Sarah B. Cooper, who out of 16,000 graduates, followed up 9,000 for fifteen years. These records proved that none had ever been arrested for a criminal offence. Peter Crowley, Chief of Police, testified that during that time, out of 8,000 juvenile arrests, not one was graduated from a kindergarten.

Congress and the Birds

Congress has lately invested the Fish Commission with all powers that could be lawfully bestowed for supplementing state protection of bird-life, the bill reading that such powers referred to "the propagation, distribution, transportation, introduction and restoration of game birds and other wild fowls useful to man." During the debates, Mr. Hornaday, a well-known friend to birds, was quoted as saying: "Throughout about three-fifths of our country, exclusive of Alaska, bird-life in general is being annihilated. In many localities edible birds have become rare. Our song and insectivorous birds are now being killed for food purposes. Under present conditions, the practical annihilation of all our birds, in a comparatively short period, is certain." This wholesale slaughter of birds, we all know, is to supply hat trimmings. Fortunately, it is coming to be considered very bad form for women to wear dead birds or the feathers and wings of birds, on their hats.

The Sabbath Bell

WOULD to God that we could all come to a higher appreciation of our Sabbath heritage! We cannot count the treasures of one Christian Sabbath. It spreads out over us the two wings of the archangel of mercy. Oh, blessed Sabbath! They scoff a great deal about the old Puritanic Sabbaths, and there is a wonderful amount of wit expended upon that subject now—the Sabbaths they used to have in New England. I never lived in New England, but I would rather trust the old Puritanic Sabbath, with all its faults, than this modern Sabbath, which is fast becoming no Sabbath at all. If our modern Sabbatism shall produce as stalwart Christian character as the old New England Puritanic Sabbatism, I shall be satisfied and shall be surprised. Oh, blessed day! I should like to die some Sabbath morning, when the air is full of church music and the bells are ringing. Leaving my home group with a dying blessing, I should like to look upon some Christian assemblage chanting the praises of God as I went up to join the one hundred and forty and four thousand and the thousand of thousands standing around the throne of Jesus. Hark! I hear the bell of the old kirk on the hillside of heaven! It is a wedding-bell, for behold, the Bridegroom cometh! It is a victor's bell, for we are more than conquerors through Him who hath loved us. It is a Sabbath bell, for it calls the nations of earth and heaven to everlasting repose.

Outraged Workmen

WHEN talking about Sabbath desecration, we are apt to think chiefly of the nuisance such desecration inflicts upon Christian worshipers, and to forget the outrage on employees. Where do those bartenders get their Sunday? Do they get any more wages? No. The breaking down of Sunday, what does it mean? It means that a few men who toil shall toil seven days and get no more than they get for six. Then there are all the employees of the opera houses and the theatres, the scene-shifters, the ballet-dancers, the call-boys, the supernumeraries, making up thousands and thousands in this country. Where are they going to get their Sunday? You see them on the stage with the tinsel and the tassel and the halberds, or you see them in gauze whirling in the toe torture, and they seem queens or fairies; but after twelve o'clock at night see them going along the street in faded dress, shivering and cold and hungry, to their garrets or their cellars. It means that those people shall have no rest for the body and no rest for the soul. When you talk about opening places of secular amusement on the Sabbath, while there may be people outside of such establishments who want them, there are many of these employees who are practically praying, "Oh, God, let the crushing Juggernaut stop one day in seven!" It is a swindling process upon employees. It is a proposition to give no Sabbath to thousands and thousands and thousands of people in this country. As the attempt to obliterate our Sabbath is so very determined, the effort to preserve it ought to be better organized. Rally your voices, your pens, your printing-presses, and all your influence in the Lord's artillery corps in behalf of the Christian Sabbath. Decree before high heaven that the Sabbath which you received from your ancestors shall go down undamaged to your children. For those that die battling in this contest we will chisel the epitaph: "These are they who came out of great tribulation, and had their robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb." But for that man who proves recreant to the cause of God and his country in a crisis like this, there shall be no honorable epitaph, and he shall not be worthy of any burial-place in all this land, but perhaps some steam-tug at midnight may take him out and drop him in the sea where the lawless winds which observe no Sunday may gallop over the grave of him who in life and death proved himself a traitor to the cause of God and American institutions. Long live the Christian Sabbath! Perish forever all attempts to overthrow it!

Sunshine

SHOW me a man who never lights up with sportfulness, and has no sympathy with the recreations of others, and I will show you a man who is a stumbling-block in the way to the kingdom of God. Such men are caricatures of religion. They lead young people to think that a man is good in proportion as he groans or frowns, and looks sallow, and that the height of a man's Christian stature is in proportion to the length of his face. I would trade off five-hundred such men, for one bright-faced, radiant Christian on whose face you may see the words, "Rejoice! evermore." On his way to business every morning by his cheerful face he preaches fifty sermons. I will go further, and say that I have no confidence in a man who makes a religion of his gloomy looks. That kind of man always turns out badly. I would not want him for the treasurer of an orphan asylum. The orphans would suffer. Among forty people whom I received into the church one communion, there was only one applicant of whose piety I was suspicious. He had the longest story to tell; had seen the most visions, and gave an experience so rapturous and profound that all the other applicants were discouraged. I was not surprised, in a year after, to learn that he had run off with the funds of the bank with which he was connected. Who is this black angel that you call religion—wings black, feet black, feathers black? Our religion is a bright angel—feet bright, eyes bright, wings bright. There are some persons who, when talking to a minister, always feel it politic to look lugubrious. Go forth, O people! to your lawful amusements. God means you to be happy. But when there are so many sources of innocent pleasure, why tamper with anything that is dangerous and polluting? Why stop our ears to a heaven full of songsters, to listen to the hiss of a dragon? Why turn back from the mountain-side, abloom with wild flowers, and with blistered feet attempt to climb the hot sides of fire-belching Cotopaxi?

Make Yourself

IF a young man start from a good, honest, industrious Christian mother, he graduates from a university better than that of Berlin or Edinburgh, with a diploma in each hand. Every sound man starts life with a capital of at least one hundred thousand dollars—I say every man. You [illegible] prove it. Your right arm—will you take five thousand dollars and have it cut off? "No," you say. Then certainly it is worth five thousand dollars, and your left arm is worth as much, and your right foot as much, and your left foot as much. Twenty thousand dollars of capital to start with. Your mind — for how much would you go up and spend your life in Bloomingdale asylum? Twenty thousand dollars for your intellect? You would refuse it. It is worth that, anyhow—forty thousand dollars of equipment. Then you have an immortal soul— for how much would you sell it? For sixty thousand dollars? "No," you say, with indignation. Then certainly it is worth that much. And there are your one hundred thousand dollars—the magnificent outfit with which the Lord God Almighty started every one of you. And yet there are young men who are waiting for others to come and start them—to make them; waiting for institutions to make them; waiting for circumstances to make them. Fool! go and make yourself.

HURT BOOKS

At Greatly Reduced Prices

Books, like people, are subject to accidents—only a little more so. We frequently see the danger and escape it, but books have no eyes to see and no power to act; hence when an accident comes their way they are apt to get the full benefit of it.

In the handling of books we are, of course, as careful as can be to preserve them from injury, but, notwithstanding the exercise of all this care, books will get hurt. The covers will get rubbed; a nail will somehow or other be diverted from its course and, instead of entering the case, will go through a book; soiled hands will leave their marks, and careless express companies will occasionally damage the corners. With most of the books thus hurt the injury is so slight that we could almost send them out as absolutely undamaged, but THE CHRISTIAN HERALD never sends out a premium book that is not absolutely new, fresh and unblemished.

Where the damage is clearly perceptible the books are condemned, and either given away, re-bound, or destroyed; but where the hurt does not exceed the average wear and tear which a book usually receives in the course of one perusal, we always give our readers the opportunity of purchasing such books at greatly reduced price, and thus frequently we are enabled to place very superior literature within the reach of those who could not afford it had they to pay the full price.

Here is a list of hurt books from which you may make your choice, either for yourself, your friends or some Sunday School Library which you desire to enrich through your liberality, and the prices stated include free delivery to your address unless otherwise specified.

232 Copies "Onward to Fame and Fortune" at 50 cents.

211 Copies "Stepping Stones to Happiness" at 50 cents.

281 Copies "Home Life Made Beautiful" at 50 Cents.

254 Sets CHRISTIAN HERALD Library No. 1, consisting of 10 volumes, bound in red and gilt, per set $1.00.

33 Sets "World Wide Encyclopædia," 15 volumes, 7,000 pages, covers slightly faded, otherwise absolutely perfect; regular price $26.00; cut price $13.00; our price, freight NOT prepaid, per set $6.50.

48 Copies "Columbia's War for Cuba," at 40 Cents.

All the above books are perfect, except for slight damage. They are great bargains, and we would advise such of our readers as care to avail themselves of the opportunities here offered, to act promptly, as otherwise the books of their choice may be sold before their order reaches us. Address

Two small steps in the direction of religious liberty have been taken by the Russian Senate. The hierarchy of the Greek Church actively opposed both measures.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

The Second Battle of Manila

HOPES of a peaceful solution of the trouble in the Philippines were rudely shattered by the receipt of a cablegram from Manila, Sunday, Feb. 5, conveying the news of an important battle which began on Saturday night, and was still in progress. Later dispatches brought details showing that the Filipino insurgents, who were encamped in the suburbs of Manila, had precipitated the fighting, by an effort to cross the line of our outposts. On being forced back, the Filipinos immediately fired a gun as a signal for a general attack on the Americans. The First Nebraska Regiment promptly met their advance and poured in a heavy fire which drove the insurgents to their trenches. Soon the engagement became general all along the front, and our troops were hurried forward, the regiments in action being the Idaho, Nebraska, California, Colorado, Wyoming, Tennessee and Washington Infantry, the Third and Sixth Artillery and the Fourteenth Regulars. Our forces were magnificently handled by Gen. Otis and his staff, and although the enemy fought with desperation, they were out-generalled at all points, and driven from every position. The villages of San Juan del Monte, Santa Ana (the Filipino headquarters), San Pedro Macati, Santa Mesa and Lomis were successively captured and occupied by the Americans. Many of the enemy were driven into the Pasig River and drowned by a charge of General King's Brigade. Fighting continued intermittently during the night and the battle raged with redoubled energy after daylight dawned on Sunday. Three of Admiral Dewey's warships—the monitor Monadnock, cruiser Charleston, and gunboat Concord, lying off Malate, inflicted severe losses upon the enemy's flanks, using both shells and secondary batteries with terrible effect, when the light was sufficient to get the range. Cablegrams from Gen. Otis and Admiral Dewey, announce the victory as complete and say our losses were slight. Two men were wounded on the Monadnock, and among our land troops, it is estimated that less than forty were killed and 175 wounded. Four thousand Filipinos are reported to have fallen under the withering fusilade, which literally mowed them down; while their own marksmanship, though armed with Mausers and Remingtons, was exceedingly poor. A part of the insurgent force consisted of spearmen and bowmen, who were unable to stand before the deadly fire of modern weapons, and were soon dispersed. It is not by any means certain that this defeat, crushing though it was, will end the insurrection. Aguinaldo, under whose ambitious leadership this new war has been precipitated, may require a still more severe lesson before he can be induced to retire from a leadership which has stood as the principal barrier between the native Filipinos and the peace and prosperity they have so much desired, after their years of wasting warfare with Spain. He is like the men whom the apostle denounced who deceived the people with promises of liberty, only to bring them into a worse bondage than that from which they have been delivered:

GEN. OTIS, THE VICTOR OF MANILA

For when they speak great swelling words of vanity they allure . . . those that were clean escaped from them who live in error; while they promise them liberty, they themselves are the servants of corruption (II. Peter 2 : 18).

A Ring with a Story

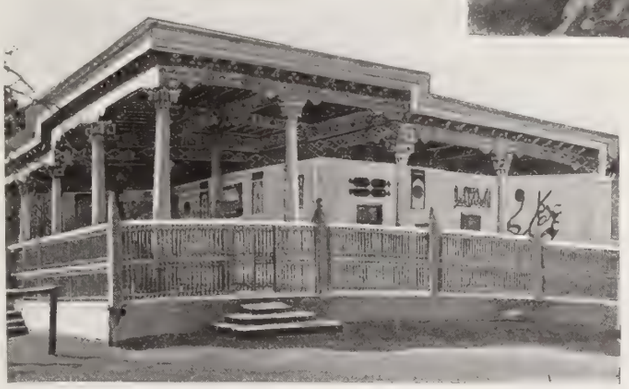
A lady prominent in Washington society gave to a reporter of the Post of that city recently, a romantic history of a ring she was wearing. It is an old-fashioned ring containing a lock of faded brown hair covered by a glass setting. Nearly forty years ago, the white-haired lady who now wears the ring cut that tress of hair from her own curls and gave it to a jeweler, to be enclosed in a ring, which she gave to her soldier lover, when he was setting out for the war. It can be imagined how he prized this memento of the girl he loved. Through many a weary month, in many a sad scene, it remained on the finger on which she had placed it. One day, after one of the fierce battles of the Wilderness, the young officer was carried, wounded, to the field-hospital. He was insensible, but the surgeons saw that there was life in him and it might be preserved by amputating his arm. There was no time to be lost and they cut through the sleeve and having done their work, sent the limb away with the sleeve and gauntlet still on it. A friend was beside his bed when the young officer recovered his senses, who gently told him what had been done. His first thought was of his treasured ring. "Where was it?" His friend went to the door of the hospital and there in a ghastly heap of dismembered limbs, he found the arm. He removed the gauntlet and saw the ring which he took to the mutilated sufferer. It was put on the only hand he had left and his mind was relieved. This is the ring that his wife now wears. To her it is endeared by the affection in which her husband held it for her sake. Its intrinsic value is probably small, but as the symbol of a love which manifested itself in that trying hour, it is precious beyond price. It is such a love that gives Christ a claim on his followers.

Having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them unto the end (John 13 : 1).

A Child's Decision

A case of domestic unhappiness was brought into a police court in New York a few days ago for settlement. A man appeared as prosecutor and charged his sister-in-law with having stolen his son, a child four years old. From the evidence it appeared that there had been a dispute between the prosecutor and his wife which had led to a suit for divorce. The child had been awarded to the care of his father, though whether that was done by the court or by private arrangement, was disputed. It was evident, however, that if the child's mother had agreed to let her husband have the child, she had after ward repented. Her sister had consequently carried him off and handed him to his mother. The magistrate having heard the facts took a summary method of administering justice. He took the child into his private room, and sent for the father and mother. He then allowed the child to go to either of them, and he went to his mother and climbed on her knee and kissed her. When the father took hold of him he resisted and clung to his mother. The magistrate said that would settle the case as far as his court was concerned. He would not sanction the taking of the child from his mother whom he evidently loved. It may be hoped that the magistrate's decision will be respected and that the child will be allowed to remain with his mother. It is much to be wished that the children of God were similarly prompt to show their love for him when they are put to the test. Too often they turn from him to the world.

My people have been lost sheep; their shepherds have caused them to go astray; they have turned them away on the mountains; they have gone from mountain to hill; they have forgotten their resting place (Jer. 50 : 6).



TERMINUS AT SAMARKAND OF THE RUSSIAN RAILROAD

DOUBLE-DECKED CARS ON THE TRANS-CASPIAN RAILROAD

False Gems Detected

Dealers in precious stones in Holland are now making use of the Roentgen rays to test the gems submitted to them, and American dealers are said to be preparing to follow their example. A European journal publishes reproductions of photographs taken of several genuine and false stones by the rays. Among them are photographs of a large black diamond, a fine Delhi diamond, and an imitation diamond made of highly refracting glass. The imitation stone was so good an imitation, that it deceived men who were considered good judges, and was pronounced false only by a professional diamond cutter. All three were subjected to the rays, and the test was unmistakable. The rays passed through the genuine stones, but were completely stopped by the glass. In the photograph, the latter is simply a black shadow. The inventor of the tubes used in producing the rays, says that the test can be made without a photograph being taken. If the gems are suspended between a screen and the source of the rays, the shadow they cast on the screen will show distinctly whether they are genuine or imitations made of glass. It is so with the heavenly light. The counterfeit Christian is sometimes so like the true, that it is difficult to detect him, but it is the true alone who, receiving the light of God, becomes a light to the world.

All things when they are reproved are made manifest by the light; for everything that is made manifest is light (Eph. 5 : 13).

Tracks in the Desert

One of the most wonderful railroads in the world has just been completed in Western Asia. It runs from Krasnovoksk on the eastern shore of the Caspian Sea, to Samarkand, on the northeastern frontier of Turkestan, a distance of nine hundred miles. It was constructed by the Russian Government for a strategic purpose. When the Czar added to his unwieldy empire the district known as the Khanatz, it became a question how communication could be maintained with Khiva, Bokhara and Kokhand, which were isolated by the deserts surrounding them. Lomakin and Skoboleff experienced stupendous difficulty in transporting their expeditions over these arid plains and urged the necessity of bringing the region into direct communication with St. Petersburg to maintain possession and defend it in case of attack. Several schemes were devised, but it was soon perceived that the most feasible was a railroad. This was advocated by General Annenkoff, who had made a close personal study of the conditions. The plans were drawn and the execution was placed under the superintendence of Gen. Annenkoff. Two gigantic problems had to be solved. One was to get a firm bed in the ever-shifting sands, and prevent their burying the tracks within a month of their being laid, and the other to carry the tracks over the River Oxus, which is at that point more than two miles wide. To overcome the first of these difficulties, search was made for a shrub which would grow in the desert and would bind the sand together with its roots. After a long series of experiments by eminent botanists it was found that a lichen called saxaoul would effect the purpose. It was planted by millions over the district through which the line was to run. Wooden fences also were erected at places where wind storms were frequent, to check the drift of the sand. The crossing of the Oxus, of necessity involved the building of a huge bridge, or rather a series of bridges, the spans of which vary from 5,740 feet to 200 feet. They rest on piles driven into the river bed. The timber for this purpose had to be brought from Russia, as none of sufficient durability grows in Central Asia. The whole work of constructing the railroad has involved an expenditure of twelve and a half million dollars. Though the object of so large an outlay is warlike, and is intended to facilitate the movements of an army, the time is coming when such works will be undertaken for a very different purpose. When Christ comes to reign, the command for such highways as this railroad in the desert will issue, in order that all people shall share in the blessings of his rule:

Prepare ye the way of the Lord, make straight in the desert a highway for our God (Isa. 40 : 3).

ILLUSTRATED BY A SERIES OF NEW AND REALISTIC PHOTOGRAPHS, TAKEN SPECIALLY FOR "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD"

A HOOK AND LADDER TRUCK ON DUTY

ENGINE NO. 1—THE NEWEST IN THE DEPARTMENT

IT is justly claimed that New York has the finest Fire Department in the world—the best equipped and, in all respects, the most efficient. With an average of four thousand fires every year to contend against, and with one of the richest and most densely-populated cities of modern times, it has been considered wise to spare no expense in adding to the completeness of the equipment of this important arm of the public service. No body of men was ever brought under finer discipline than this trained army of strong, courageous fire-fighters who are constantly on guard, day and night, to protect the lives and property of the dwellers in the great metropolis. The stories of the heroic deeds of New York firemen, if even briefly told, would fill many pages of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Their bravery in the face of deadly peril; their disregard of personal danger, when striving to rescue others, and their coolness and daring in the face of obstacles that would appall most men, have been demonstrated a thousand times. Many a noble-souled "fire laddie" has perished in the performance of his duty, and the records of the department show a long roll of those who have become victims to flame, smoke or the falling wall. Many, too, have gloriously rescued others at the cost of their own lives—dying as martyrs die, that others might live.

Yet with all its attendant perils, there is something peculiarly fascinating about the life of a fireman. To those who have never witnessed a "turn-out" by a New York fire company, the photographs on these pages will afford an idea of what it means. In all the engine-houses there is constantly on duty a "house-watchman," who sits at a desk beside a number of gongs and other alarm apparatus for announcing fires. A preliminary "click," which his quick ear instantly catches, is the forerunner of an alarm. Almost at the first strike of the gong (which is to call out the men and machines at that particular station), bolts, levers, counterweights, and wires are suddenly animated, and the whole mass of machinery is set in motion. The horses are automatically released from their stalls. A large gong booms out its signal of warning closely after the smaller gong. Bells, big and little, join in to make what seems to an outsider an indistinguishable clamor, but it is perfectly intelligible to the trained operator. Long ere the clanging has ceased, the firemen in the "bunk-room" overhead have swung themselves down the polished sliding-pole to the engine floor; the horses are hitched to the machine in a twinkling, and bound to the door, the men nimbly leaping to their places on the machine as it starts. The quick-blazing fire under the boiler is fanned by the swift motion (there is always ten or twelve pounds of steam pressure on) and the apparatus is practically ready for use at the moment of the start.

When the scene of conflagration is reached by both engine and hose-truck, the hose is quickly cast out and attached to the hydrant, and the serious work begins. It may be an "inside fire," within a large block of buildings, difficult to reach and requiring the use of many hundreds of feet of hose, led up hallways or alleys and over high roofs. There is a picturesque confusion in the assembly of puffing and panting engines, the dense clouds of smoke belching out of windows and doorways and hiding the sky, the stern work of the men at the nozzles, skilfully throwing the great streams of water into the heart of the fire. A score of engines may sometimes be seen at a single fire distributed among the surrounding blocks, to be convenient to the hydrants. Policemen press back the great crowds of spectators who would otherwise impede the firemen. It may be a great factory fire, with scores of lives imperilled; a hotel ablaze, with guests frantically calling for the ladders, or a crazy, tottering tenement, whose occupants may escape a holocaust, only by a sudden deluge from the pipemen. These are moments fraught with danger. Showers of sparks fly in all directions, chimneys topple, and bricks, timbers and plaster fly outward, glass windows crash to the sidewalks, and above all, when the conflagration gets thoroughly started, can be heard the fierce roar of the flames, as they seethe upward with a furnace-heat that forces the crowds back to avoid being scorched. Last of all to retreat are the firemen, who bravely hold out till the heat becomes insupportable. This is no overdrawn description, but is true of many fires that occur in New York every year.

One of the valued adjuncts in fighting fire, under certain conditions, is the "water-tower," of which there are several in the Department. When it can be raised in front of a building in the early stages of a fire it does very effective work, pouring a swift, steady stream of 2,000 gallons of water per minute on the flames—a volume sufficient to drown out any fire not too far advanced to permit of its use.

The feats of strength by firemen, the ability to climb up to dizzy points, to manipulate ropes and scaling ladders with confidence and celerity, always excite wonder and admiration among spectators. These qualities are largely the result of the splendid training the men receive at the Firemen's School which was organized in 1883. There they learn to excel in such exercises as "the chain of ladders" (in which two or three firemen, each with single ladders, can scale to dizzy heights), climbing en echelon, the use of the life-net, the life-saving roof-line, and many other appliances for effective work at fires.

The vast and complicated mechanism of the fire-alarm system at headquarters is a sight well worth seeing. The registers in use there are each capable of recording the alarms sent in from more than 1,000 fire-alarm boxes. A "transmitter," run by clockwork, sends out all the alarms received. A busy corps of operators is constantly at work among the many instruments, and the duties of safe-guarding life and property are performed with the rarest skill and intelligence.

No branch of the public service has kept better pace with the growth of New York than the Fire Department. In the days of Dutch occupation, leather buckets and the simplest hand apparatus were employed in fighting fires. When the first hand engine was introduced, a night patrol of eight men was appointed, and hooks, poles and ladders were brought from Holland. In 1731 two hand engines were bought in England. The first engine-house was built on Broad st. Step by step the Department progressed. To-day it is an immense organization with an army of firemen, governed by a Commissioner, and ably commanded by Fire-Chief Hugh Bonner, under whom are two Deputy Chiefs and twelve Chiefs of Battalion.

It has over 100 splendid modern steam engines, with a suitable supply of marine engines or "fire-boats" (for water-front service), water-towers for high fires, chemical engines, chemical fire extinguishers, besides hundreds of horses many hose-trucks, hook-and-ladder trucks, and all the latest improved appliances.

"A BEAUTIFUL POSSIBILITY"

A New and Charming Serial Story, Written Exclusively for "The Christian Herald"

BY EDITH FERGUSON BLACK

SUMMARY OF THE STORY

[illegible] gentleman of learning, culture and wealth, was living with his only daughter, Evadne, a beautiful girl, who, at the opening of the story is sixteen years of age. Mr. Hildreth, though charitable and [illegible] in faith and love to Christ. He intended telling his daughter of the change, but a sudden seizure of illness found him with the disclosure not made. With his dying breath he enjoined her to make it [illegible] whom he had reared a pagan, could not understand his injunction. After his death, she removes to the home of her uncle, Judge Hildreth, at Marlborough, in New England to whom, as his only brother, Lenox Hildreth confided her and her large [illegible] her father's injunction, but her uncle, aunt and cousins, though professing Christians, cannot help her to find Christ. From Pompey, her uncle's colored coachman and his wife Dycie, Evadne gains the first practical idea of what finding Christ means. On a farm in the neighborhood of Marlborough, John Randolph, a young man, who has lost par[illegible] employ of Mr. Hawthorne. In his work and in his relations with his employer's family he is trying to shape his life on the principles of Christ's teaching.

CHAPTER XV.

An Offer of Rest

JOHN RANDOLPH walked slowly through the soft dawning. It had been a brilliant night. The late moon had risen as he was bidding goodbye to the graceful creatures he should never see again, and Hollywood had been clad in a bewitching beauty which made it all the harder to say farewell. Far into the night he had lingered, visiting every corner of the beloved home—then at last he had turned away, and walked steadily along the road which led to Marlborough.

The sun rose in a blaze of majestic splendor, and the birds began to twitter. The gripsack which he carried grew strangely heavy, and he felt faint and weary. The long strain of the day before was telling upon him, and it was many hours since he had tasted food.

A sudden turn of the road brought him in sight of a trim little farm against whose red gate a man was leaning, leisurely enjoying the beauty of the morning before he began work. He had a pleasant face, strong and peaceful. No one had ever known Joseph Makepeace to be out of temper or in a hurry. He would have said it was because he commenced every day listening to the inner voice among the silences of nature. Joseph Makepeace was a Quaker.

"Why, John lad," he cried, "thou'rt a welcome sight on this fair morning. Come in! Come in! Breakfast will soon be ready, and thou art in sore need of it by the look of thy face." He gave John's hand a mighty grasp and took his gripsack from him.

"Why, John, hast thou walked far with this load? Where were all the horses of Hollywood? Is anything wrong, John? I don't like thy looks, lad."

John's voice trembled. "I have left Hollywood," he said. "Mr. Hawthorne has turned me off."

"Left Hollywood! You don't mean it, John! Well, well, folks say Robert Hawthorne has not been right in his mind since his boy got hurt. I believe it now. It's a comfort that the great Master will never turn us off, lad. Thee'd better lie down on the lounge and rest thee a bit John, while I go and tell mother."

He entered the spotless kitchen where his wife was moving blithely to and fro.

"Thee has another unawares angel to breakfast, Ruth. It's a grand thing being on the public road."

Ruth Makepeace laughed merrily.

"An angel, Joseph. I hope he's not like thy last one, who stole three of my best silver spoons!"

"So, so; thee did'st promise to forget that, Ruth, if I replace them next time I go to Marlborough."

"Well, so I do, except when thee reminds me. Is this a very hungry angel, Joseph? Does thee think I'd better cook another chicken?"

"He ought to be hungry, poor lad, but I doubt if he eats much. Does thee remember Friend Randolph, Ruth?"

"Of course I do, but he's been dead these ten years. Thee doesn't mean he's come back to breakfast with us?"

Her husband put his hands on her shoulders and shook her gently. Then he kissed her. "Thee is tractious this morning, Ruth. Friend Randolph had a son, dost mind, whom Robert Hawthorne took to live at Hollywood. It is he whom the good Lord has sent to us to care for, Ruth. He's just been turned adrift."

"If thee wasn't so big, I'd shake thee, Joseph! The idea of John Randolph being in this house and thee beating round the bush with thine angels!" and with all her motherhood shining in her eyes, Ruth Makepeace started for the parlor.

In spite of the overflowing kindness with which he was surrounded, John found the meal a hard one. He had been used to breakfast with little Nan upon his knee.

"When thee is rested we'll have a talk, lad," said his host, as they rose from the table, "but thee'd better bide with us for the summer and not fret about the future. Thee dost need a holiday."

"Of course thee dost, John," said blithe little Mrs. Makepeace. "I wish thee would bide for good."

Her husband laid his hand upon his shoulder. "Thou knowest, lad, there is a little grave out yonder. Thee shouldst have his place in our hearts and home. Would'st thee be content to bide, John?"

John Randolph looked at his friends with shining eyes. "You have done me good for life!" he said. "But the world calls me, I must go. I mean to work my way through college, and be a physician, Mr. Makepeace."

"So, so! Well, we mustn't stand in the way, Ruth. Thee'll make a good one, John. But how art thee going to manage it, lad?"

"The steel works in Marlborough pay good wages. I mean to get a place there, if I can, and study in the evenings."

"Why, John, lad, the steel works shut down yesterday afternoon." For an instant the brave spirit quailed, but only for an instant. "Then I must find something else," he said quietly.

"It's a bad season, John, and the times are hard." Joseph Makepeace thought for a moment. "There's friend Harris up the river. What dost thee think, Ruth?"

"Why, he wants men to pile wood," exclaimed his wife. "Thee would'st not set John at that!"

"Lincoln split rails," said John with a smile, "why should I not pile them? It's clean work, and honest, Mrs. Makepeace."

"He has a logging camp in winter. Thee would'st have good pay, then, John."

"But thee would'st be so lonely, John, amongst all those rough men, and thee did'st say once it was dangerous, Joseph. It's not fit work for John."

"I am not afraid of work, Mrs. Makepeace, and I can never be lonely, now I am sure of the constant abiding with me of Jesus Christ."

CHAPTER XVI.

The same morning Evadne, in her Vermont refuge, was reading aloud from a paper she had brought from the post office. "The whole sum of Christian living is just loving! Do you believe that, Aunt Marthe?"

"Surely, dear child. 'Love is the fulfilling of the law,' you know. When we love God with our whole heart and our neighbor as ourselves, there is no danger of our breaking the decalogue. 'He who loveth, knoweth God,' and to know him is life eternal."

"Just love," said Evadne, musingly. "It seems so simple."

"Do you think so?" said Aunt Marthe with a smile. "Yet people find it the hardest thing to do, as it is surely the noblest. Drummond calls it 'the greatest thing in the world,' and you have Paul's definition of it in Corinthians. Did you ever study that, to see how perfect love would make us? 'Love suffereth long,' that does away with impatience; 'and is kind,' that makes us neighborly; 'love envieth not,' that saves from covetousness; 'vaunteth not itself,' that does away with self-conceit; 'seeketh not her own,' that kills selfishness; 'is not easily provoked' [illegible] 'rejoiceth not in unrighteousness,' makes us love only what is pure; 'covereth all things,' that leaves no room for scandal; 'believeth all things,' that does away with doubt; 'hopeth all things,' that is the antithesis of distrust; 'endureth all things,' proves that we are strong; and then the beautiful summing up of the whole matter, 'love never faileth.' If that is true of us, it can only be as we are filled with the Spirit of the Christ of God, whose nature and whose name is love."

"You see such beautiful things in the Bible!" said Evadne, despairingly, "why [illegible]"

"You will, dearie, you forget I have been digging nuggets from this precious mine for years and you have just begun to search for them. Would you like another drive, or do you feel too tired?"

"Not in the least. What can I do for [illegible]"

"I would like to send some of that currant jelly I made yesterday to old Mrs. Riggs, the mother of my old friend Penelope, whose acquaintance you made the other day. Are you sure you would like to take it?"

"As sure as sure can be, dear," said Evadne with a kiss. "Where shall I find it?"

"In the King's corner. You have not seen that yet. I always give the Lord the first fruits of my cooking and keep them in a special place set apart for his use; then, when I go to see the sick, there is always something ready to tempt their fancy. It is wonderful what a saving of time it is. I rarely have to make anything [illegible] thing prepared."

She followed her niece out to the carriage, helped her pack the jelly safely with one of her crisp loaves of fresh brown bread, bade her a merry farewell, and went back to the house again, singing.

"Oh, Aunt Marthe," cried Evadne, as she drove slowly under the trees, "shall I ever, ever learn to be like you?"

She found the old lady sitting by the fire, wrapped up in a shawl, although the day was sultry.

"Good morning," said Evadne, as she deposited her parcels on the table. "I come from Mrs. Everidge. She thought you would fancy some of her fresh brown bread and currant jelly."

"Hum!" said the old lady ungraciously. "I hope it's better than the last wuz. Guess Mis' Everidge ain't as perticklar es she used ter be."

"Aunt Marthe!" cried Evadne indignantly, "why everything she does is perfection."

"Land, child! There ain't no perfecshun in this world. It's all a wale, a wale o' tears. We'se poor miserable critters—wurms of the dust—that's what we be."

"There isn't any worm about Aunt Marthe," cried Evadne with a merry laugh. "I think you must be looking through a wrong pair of spectacles, Mrs. [illegible]"

"Land, child! I ain't got but the one pair, an' they got broke this mornin'. But it's jest my luck — everythin' goes agin' me."

"But you can get them mended," said Evadne.

"Sakes alive! There ain't much hope of them gettin' mended, with Penel behindhand on the rent, an' the firin', and the land knows what else. I don't see why Penel ain't more forehanded. I tell her ef I wuz es young an spry es she be, I guess I'd hev things different; but, la! that's Penel's way. She's terrible sot in her own way—Penel is. She's not willin' to take my advice. Child'en nowadays alwers duz know more than their mothers."

"Where is Penelope?" asked Evadne.

"Oh, skykin' 'round! She's gone over to Miss Johnsings, ter help with the quiltin'. That's the way she duz, and here I am all alone with the fire ter tend ter, an not a livin' soul ter do a hand's turn for me. She sez she hez ter do it, ter keep the pot bilin'; 'pears ter me Penel's pots take a sight uv bilin'."

"But she has left a nice pile of wood close beside you, Mrs. Riggs."

"La, yes," grumbled the old lady, "but it's dretful thoughtless in her ter stay away so long, when she knows the stoopin' cums so hard on my rheumatiz. An' it's terrible lonesome—I get that nervous sum days I'm all uv a shake. 'Taint ez if she hev anuthin ter do, but I reckon she [illegible] Dean over ter Hampton's a half an hour a half! She ez one [illegible] folks wants things done, but [illegible] folks might set a spell [illegible] Dean over ter Hampton's a half an hour a half! She ez one [illegible] folks wants things done, but [illegible] folks might set a spell [illegible] Dean over ter Hampton's a half an hour a half! She ez one [illegible] folks wants things done, but [illegible] folks might set a spell [illegible] eat me up, fer all Penel would know. She gets so taken up a larfin' an' singin'—she ain't got no sympathy. Oh, it's a [illegible]"

"But there are no bears in Vernon, Mrs. Riggs," laughed Evadne.

"Land, child! You never know what there might be!" said the old lady testily. "Be you a stayin' at Mis' Everidge's?"

"Yes," said Evadne, "she is my aunt."

"Hum! I never knew she hed any nieces 'cept them two gals uv Judge Hil[illegible]"

"I am their cousin, Mrs. Riggs. I used to live in Barbadoes."

"Well, I declar'! Why Barbaderz is t'other side of nowhere—used ter be when I went ter school. Well, well, some folks hez a lion's share uv soarin, an here I've been all my life jest a pinin' my heart out ter git down ter Bosting, an ain't never got there—but that's alwers the way.—I never git nuthin'. I'm sixty-nine years old cum Christmas, an' I ain't never ben further away from hum than twenty miles hand runnin,' an' here's a chit like you done travelin' enuff to last a life time."

"But I didn't want to travel, Mrs. Riggs," said Evadne, gently. "I would so much rather have stayed at home."

"There yer go," grumbled the old lady. "Folks aint never satisfied with their mercies. Alwers a flyin' in the face uv Providence. I tell you we'se wurms, child, miserable, shiftless wurms, a crawlin' down in this walley uv humiliation, with our faces ter the dust."

"But you've got a great deal to be thankful for, Mrs. Riggs," ventured Evadne, "in having such a daughter. Aunt Marthe thinks she is a splendid character."

"So she oughter be!" retorted the old lady, "with such a bringin' up ez she's hed. But, land! child'ens dredful disappointin' ter a body! There aint a selfish bone in my body, but Penel's ez full uv em. She'll let me lie awake by the hour at a time while she's a snoozin' on the sofy beside me. She don't sleep on her own bed any more, because I hev ter hev her handy ter rub me when the rheumatiz gits ter jumpin'. She sez she can't help bein' drowsy when she's workin' through the day; but, land! she'd manage ter keep awake ef she had any sympathy! She aint got no sympathy, Penel aint, and she aint a bit forehanded.

"But I don't 'spect nothin' else in this world. It's a wale o' tears an' we aint got nuthin' else to look fur but triberlation an' woe. Man ez born ter trouble es the sparks fly upward, an' a woman alwers hez the lion's share."

Evadne had heard enough of the querulous old woman's talk. She wished her good-morning and left her. All the way home she thought of her friend, Penelope, and sympathized with her in the trial it must be to live with such a discontented creature. Aunt Marthe saw her coming and nodded cheerily from the window.

Evadne burst into the sitting room with flashing eyes.

"Aunt Marthe, if I were Penelope Riggs, I should be tempted to shoot her mother! She is just a crooked old bundle of unreasonableness and ingratitude.

Mrs Everidge laughed. "No, you wouldn't dear—not if you were Penelope."

"But Aunt Marthe, how does she stand it? Why, it would drive me crazy in a week! To think of that poor soul working like a slave all day and then grudged the few winks of sleep she gets on a hard old sofa. I declare, it makes me feel hopeless!"

"You forget that Penelope lives on the heights. I saw a type of that once when I was in Europe. The day I climbed Mont Blanc, we had a wonderful experience. Down below us a sudden storm swept the valley. The rain fell in torrents, and the thunder roared, but up where we stood the sun was shining and all was still. When we walk with Christ little one, we find it possible to live above the clouds."

"An Alpine Christian!" cried Evadne. "Oh! Aunt Marthe, that is beautiful!"

THE NIAGARA ICE-PALACE

A Fairy-like Structure at which Thousands Gaze—Wonder and Admiration—The Frozen Flood

NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y., Feb. 1.—This is a fairyland. It is wildly beautiful here these mid-winter days, for an artist has been at work who exhibits his masterpieces nowhere but in nature's grand abodes. Zero, the artist in white, with magic touch has changed the desolation of January into the crystal splendor of to-day. Prospect Park is no longer a dreary waste of woodland. Every tree has a drapery of nameless grace, every shrub a glittering cluster of pearls.

To the tourist who has never seen Niagara save in her dress of summer green, the picture is an inspiration. The misty clouds of spray roll in from the great black gulf below, and silently, daintily sketch on the trees a fretwork of purest white.

But you must cross the foot-bridge to the Three Sister Islands if you would peep into Dame Nature's own boudoir. How the winter wind sweeps down from the North! Under your feet the tumbling waters—swift, majestic, awful in moving power. No camera can picture them.

"Lover's Rock" is worth a visit, too—that legendary tryst of the Indian maid who leaped to her sweetheart in the foam below. It is dangerous here, for the path is almost hidden in its marble coat.

Then there is the Ice Bridge. Masses upon masses of ice crushed and jammed and frozen into a steel-like arch of enormous strength. It reaches from shore to shore, and is picturesque in its very ugliness. Irregular humps deform its surface, while fractured mountains of ice mark the point where the seething waters end and the giant tunnel begins. The roar is smothered beneath twenty feet of solid ice, but it can be distinguished from the cataract's voice.

On the riverside is the new Ice Palace, the blocks of which were caught from the eddies above the falls. It is 120 feet long by 60 feet wide, having a front elevation of 30 feet, and several attempts at architectural beauty. Not much can be done in the way of ornamentation, the builder says, in comparison with the marvels of Montreal and Quebec. The cold is steadier there, and the ice cements better than in this uncertain climate; yet the palace is a pretty thing, especially when the lights are lit. At night the illuminations are of the colored order, drawing prismatic fires from the solid walls.

A brilliant winter carnival is in progress, drawing thousands of people to the unusual scene. A skating floor proves the greatest attraction within the palace walls. There is music, too, of a very good sort, and a search light plays from the New York end of the upper steel arch bridge. A fall of snow has mantled everything in winter beauty.

Nature has probably no spectacle more grand or inspiring than the sight of the frozen torrent of Niagara. To the believer, it is a manifestation of the power of that divine Architect, whose voice, proceeding out of the whirlwind, asked: "Hast thou entered into the treasures of the snow? or hast thou seen the treasures of the hail? . . . Out of whose womb came the ice? and the hoary frost of heaven, who hath gendered it? The waters are hid as with a stone and the face of the deep is frozen" (Job 38: 22, 29, 30).

A Mother's Consolation

Her Soldier Boy is Dead, but he had Found Christ at the Bowery Mission

A PATHETIC story of the late war, yet one that will be read with deep gratitude by all who love the Master and his work, is told in this letter from a stricken mother in Brooklyn:

Dear Friend: Ever since my son's death in September I have wanted to write you how grateful I feel to you, because I am sure he was converted some two years ago by stopping in your Mission in the Bowery, New York. Willie enlisted in the 201st Regt. Volunteers last July. He had just returned from Europe and was wild to enlist. We could not but be pleased to have him go, as he was so enthusiastic about the matter. In his letters to me he always was cheerful, and, I supposed, well and happy. He was at Camp Meade, Pa., when I received a telegram that he was very ill—was only in the hospital five days. I hastened to him as fast as I could, only to find he had passed away three hours before I arrived. His captain and surgeon assured me he died very happy. His last words were: "Tell mother it's all right; I am going home."

Only God knows what a comfort it is to me to feel he is "safe." Last winter he used to want me to go over to the Bowery Mission with him. "Oh, if you could hear those saved souls sing 'At the Cross,' I tell you it would do you good!" The last time he was home he told us how he would study for the ministry as soon as the war was over and devote all his life to mission work. My poor boy is at rest, and although my heart is broken, still I cannot thank you enough for the good that Mission did him. I. M. B.

To Expel the Polygamist

The Great Religious Organizations Uniting in Protest Against Brigham H. Roberts

THERE is no abatement in the agitation throughout the country for the expulsion by Congress of B. H. Roberts, the polygamous Congressman-elect from Utah. All the great missionary organizations, representing the Methodist, Presbyterian, Baptist, Congregational, Episcopal and Reformed Churches, have joined in a protest against the seating of Roberts, and in declaring that, even if his election should be held to be valid, he should be expelled under the special prerogative of Congress, empowering it to take such action whenever it deems it necessary for the honor and well-being of the legislative body. This is the view taken by ex-Senator Edmunds in his now-famous letter on the Roberts' case, which was given to the country through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The memorial issued by the united Mission Boards recites the facts concerning Roberts in no uncertain language. It states that he is "an avowed polygamist, having at least three wives;" that he was punished for polygamy in 1889 but, being still an offender, is ineligible to a seat in Congress. It declares that he has "confessedly lived with plural wives, and begotten polygamous children since 1890," and therefore has not complied with the conditions of the amnesty proclamation. It further states that he has been "a leader in the movement to repudiate the solemn covenant which Utah made with our Government," and cites his published books in evidence, and his self-confessed polygamy since Statehood. In conclusion, the memorial declares that the seating of Roberts in Congress would be an endorsement of his covenant-breaking and of his polygamous life and principles.

It is expected that the Congress of Mothers and the National Federation of Women will take official action in the form of a vigorous protest against the seating of Roberts, the polygamist.

At the National Capital the opinion is very generally expressed that Roberts will not be allowed to enter upon Congressional duties, but will be expelled. An avalanche of letters of protest from all parts of the country has poured in upon the Senators and Representatives, urging this course in the interest of public morality. Many of the letters are from women's societies and missionary and educational organizations.

Experiments and tests made by scientists of the highest repute show that the cheap alum baking powders are unfit for use in human food. They produce dyspepsia and heart trouble; doctors agree about this.

Experiments and tests made by scientists, by the Goverment, and by Boards of Health, show that Royal Baking Powder is pure and healthful; that it adds anti-dyspeptic qualities to the biscuit, bread and cake. Doctors and housekeepers agree about this.

What folly to permit the use in your food of any baking powder but Royal.

True Greatness In Medicine

Is proved by the health of the people who have taken it. More people have been made well, more cases of disease and sickness have been cured by Hood's Sarsaparilla than by any other medicine in the world. The peculiar combination, proportion and process in its preparation make Hood's Sarsaparilla peculiar to itself and unequalled by any other.

BREAD is the representative human food, because wheat, of which it is made, embraces all the elements of nutrition necessary to build up and sustain every part of the system, keeping it in good working condition and preserving it unimpaired to a ripe old age. BREAD made from the Fine Flour of the Entire Wheat contains far more nutriment than the same amount of fresh beef—pound for pound. It is made from sound and well-ripened wheat, as such wheat only contains the full complement of bone, muscle, brain and nerve food.

Illustrations and Incidents in the Life of the World's Greatest Evangelist

NOT long ago there lived an old bed-ridden saint, and a Christian lady who visited her found her always very cheerful. This visitor had a lady friend of wealth, who constantly looked on the dark side of things, and was always cast down, although she was a professed Christian. She thought it would do this lady good to see the bed-ridden saint, so she took her down to the house. She lived up in the garret, five stories up, and when they had got to the first story, the lady drew up her dress and said:

"How dark and filthy it is!"

"It's better higher up," said her friend.

They got to the next story, and it was no better; the lady complained again, but her friend replied:

"It's better higher up."

At the third floor it seemed still worse, and the lady kept complaining, but her friend kept saying:

"It's better higher up."

At last they got to the fifth story, and when they went into the sick-room, there was a nice carpet on the floor, flowering plants in the window, and little birds singing. And there they found this bed-ridden saint—one of those saints whom God is polishing for his own temple in heaven above.

The lady said to her, "It must be very hard for you to lie here."

She smiled and said, "It's better higher up."

Yes! And if things go against us, my friends, let us remember that "it's better higher up."

A Fragrant Act

There is a preacher in Edinburgh, but I never think of him as a preacher, although he is one of the finest preachers in Scotland. There is one act associated with that man that I will carry in remembrance to the grave.

There is a hospital for little children in Edinburgh, and that great minister, with a large parish and a large congregation, goes one afternoon every week and sits down and talks with those little children—a good many of them there for life; they are incurable. One day he found a little boy, only six years old, who had been brought over from Fife. The little fellow was in great distress because the doctors were coming to take off his leg. Think how you would feel, if you had a little brother six years old and the doctor was coming in forty-eight hours to take off his leg!

Well, that minister tried to comfort the boy, and said: "Your father will come to be with you."

"No," he said, "my father is dead; he cannot be here."

"Well, your mother will come."

"My mother is over in Fife. She is sick and cannot possibly come."

The minister himself could not come, so he said, "Well, you know the matron here is a mother; she has got a great big heart."

The little chin began to quiver as the boy said: "Perhaps Jesus will be with me."

Do you have any doubt of it? Next Friday the man of God went to the hospital, but he found the cot was empty. The poor boy was gone; the Saviour had come and taken him to his bosom.

One little act of kindness will often live a good deal longer than a most magnificent sermon.

"More to Follow"

Rowland Hill used to tell a good story of a rich man and a poor man in his congregation. The rich man desired to do an act of benevolence, and so he sent a sum of money to a friend to be given to this poor man as he thought best. The friend just sent him five pounds and said in the note:

"This is thine. Use it wisely. There is more to follow."

After awhile he sent another five pounds, and said, "more to follow."

Again and again he sent the money to the poor man, always with the cheering words, "more to follow."

So it is with the wonderful grace of God. There is always "more to follow."

A Chat With Our Friends

Platform Women and Parliamentary Courtesies—Opportunities in Public Life, Etc.

A GREAT change has come to pass in the ease and composure with which women face an audience as compared with their timidity in the same line a generation ago. The daily papers recently reported a rather interesting instance of this change, typical of the period, when a minister engaged to preach in a church to which he was perhaps to receive a call, was taken suddenly ill on Saturday night and found himself on Sunday morning unable to leave his room. His wife proved herself a helpmate equal to the emergency. Offering her services to the congregational committee, the little lady was accepted by them as her husband's substitute, and, modestly entering the pulpit, conducted the entire service, reading her husband's manuscript probably as well as he could have done it himself, and, at the close of the services, pronouncing the benediction. This latter act on her part seemed the step across the line at which most conservative people would halt, for we were not informed that she was herself in orders; nor would some of us approve of her presence in the pulpit. The worshiping assembly, however, seem to have found the service satisfactory, and the only comments upon the wife's act were those which commended her for her presence of mind and courage. Without altogether endorsing the propriety of the action, one cannot help seeing how much readier are women to preside on public occasions and to speak out in meeting than they used to be.

Undoubtedly the woman's club has had a great deal to do with accustoming women to hearing their own voices and to think upon their feet. The rule in the club that a woman shall rise and address the chair and attend strictly to the parliamentary courtesies of the occasion; that she shall so order her thoughts as to get through her speech within a given time, and that she shall not plead inability to speak when her turn comes, have all combined to make women less diffident than of old. A few days ago I attended a large gathering of women which might be considered representative of the best style of women's clubs. There were present women of all ages, from venerable matrons of seventy-five or eighty years all the way down to brilliant girls just entering society. After a pleasant social hour and reception by the president, the company, numbering perhaps one hundred and fifty in all, sat down to an elegant luncheon. This was followed by a formal coming to order and a series of addresses and subsequent discussion of a topic connected with the bringing up of children. The subject announced on the programme was "Motherhood as a Profession," which at first had an air of extravagance and unreality, but which, under the sensible and judicious treatment of the several speakers resolved itself into an all-round talk on the opinions and privileges of the American mother. So many persons spoke, and from so many different points of view, that the light brought to bear upon the theme was what might be called kaleidoscopic, and the result was very satisfactory. Full justice was done to the dear mothers of the past who brought their children up in the fear of God and managed their families and their work with less flourishing of trumpets than is apparent to-day; but a good deal was said in behalf of the conscientious and thoughtful young matron who sends her little ones to kindergartens; goes herself to a mothers' class, and perhaps engages a nurse who devotes one of her evenings out to the study of kindergarten methods.

* * *

THE impression of beauty and charm made by the many speakers lingered with me after I had left them, and the wish came that all this tender and wise thought and care for our own children might somehow filter through and inter-penetrate society in such a way that it might reach the mothers at the bottom—the poor women who in our great cities must not only bring their children up, but work by the day that those same children may be fed and clothed. It was pleasant to remember the college-bred women who are to be trained so well that they shall be progressive and broad and liberal in their culture, and who will probably not overlook the claims of this class. They will bring tact and helpfulness to bear on the problems of the poor, let us hope.

* * *

IN mid-February our nation's capital sees annually that important and significant assembly, the Mothers' Congress. If you and I cannot go to this, we can pray for it, and sympathize with a movement along such sweet, pure lines of effort, and we can resolve to bring up our own children as in God's sight.

A Veteran Fallen

Dr. Charles S. Robinson, Pastor, Preacher and Hymn-Writer, Called From Labor to Reward

MANY Christian people in this country and on the other side of the Atlantic, will hear with sincere sorrow the news that Dr. Charles S. Robinson has passed from the scene of his earthly service. His work as pastor, preacher and author had won for him a host of friends here and in Europe who will mourn his departure. Churches, too, whose musical services have been enriched by his pen, will grieve that no more of his Gospel hymns can be added to the hymnology which is the common property of all the children of God of every name. Dr. Robinson was seized early in the year with a severe attack of the grip which, with that disregard of his own concerns, characteristic of him, he neglected. He continued his usual activities until the grip changed to pneumonia. He was prostrated then, and in a few days his family were alarmed at finding that an affection of the heart, which had been chronic with him, had become acute. The best medical advice was secured, but in spite of all the most skilful physicians could do, the sufferer became weaker and, on February 1, he passed away.

THE LATE DR. C. S. ROBINSON

Dr. Robinson was a descendant, in the ninth generation, of the famous pastor of the Mayflower pioneers, who loyally set aside his ardent desire to come to the land of promise, when it was found that the larger part of the church must remain in Europe. No name was cherished by the pilgrims more sacredly than his, and his advice was received with the respect which a recollection of his wisdom and piety inculcated. In Bennington, Vt., his descendant first saw the light on March 31, 1829. From his early years he seemed to be marked out for service in the cause of Christ. He succeeded in getting a college course at Williams, maintaining himself by his pen. After his graduation he spent some time in school-teaching at Holyoke, Mass., and at Cambridge, N. Y. But the ministry was the object at which he aimed, and as soon as the way opened, he entered as a student at Union Theological Seminary, at which he remained one year. Thence he went to Princeton, from which he graduated in 1853. His first pastorate was at Troy, N. Y., from which he was called by the First Presbyterian Church, of Brooklyn, N. Y. After eight years of successful service there, the ill health of his wife necessitated a period of rest and change. He went to Europe and there found an opportunity of usefulness. The American church in Paris needed the service of a self-denying pastor. He devoted his energies to it and organized it on a stable basis. Scarcely had he succeeded in establishing it and starting it in activity, when the outbreak of the Franco-German war scattered the congregation. He returned to America and accepted the pastorate of the Eleventh Presbyterian Church in New York City. He gave time and money freely to the development of that church, and had the satisfaction of seeing it established in a beautiful and commodious house of worship. Later, he [illegible] City, reorganizing and building them up. About a year ago he resigned active ministerial labor and gave himself entirely to literary work. An English Church Bereaved

Dr. Charles A. Berry, the Proposed Successor of Mr. Beecher, Dies Suddenly in England

THE cable brings news of the sudden death, in England, of a distinguished clergyman, who had many friends on this side of the Atlantic. It will be remembered that after the death of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, Plymouth Church extended a cordial invitation to Dr. Charles A. Berry, of Wolverhampton, England. It is he who has been suddenly called from the church militant to the church triumphant. Dr. Berry had been obliged, in the fall of last year, to take a prolonged vacation and it was feared that he would never be able to resume his pastoral duties. But he gradually regained his strength and at the beginning of this year was once more in his pulpit. He was full of joy at the prospect of further service, and entered upon it with his old energy. He felt so confident of his complete restoration that he said to a reporter, who inquired about his early life, that there would be no occasion for some years to prepare an obituary notice. In this, however, he was mistaken. On January 31, he went to the neighboring town of Bilston to conduct the funeral service of a brother minister, and while offering the introductory prayer he fell to the floor and died almost instantly.

Dr. Berry was one of the most prominent of English Congregational ministers. He was a native of Lancashire, and retained through his life the sturdy principles of non-conformity which characterize the people of that section. He studied for the ministry at Airedale College, Yorkshire, and in 1875, when he was little over twenty-one years of age, became pastor of the important Congregational Church in St. George's Road, Bolton, Lancashire. He remained there, doing successful work and growing in influence in his denomination until 1883, when he was invited to the pastorate of Queen Street Church, Wolverhampton, one of the most influential churches in the English midlands. He accepted the invitation, and, in spite of flattering calls from many other churches, remained with the people to the close of his life. A very tender affection existed between pastor and people which increased from year to year. Several churches in London and other large cities pressed him to occupy pulpits of historic fame; and, in 1887, Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, honored him by inviting him to succeed Mr. Beecher, but he had only one answer for all. His love for his church and its loyalty to him had made separation a thing too painful to be borne.

Dr. Berry's brother ministers gave many proofs of the respect and hearty esteem with which they regarded him. In 1897 they elected him chairman of the Congregational Union, the highest office in their gift. Nor was this high opinion confined to his own denomination. When the free churches formed their federation which united Congregationalists, Baptists, Methodists and Presbyterians in aggressive work, Dr. Berry was made President of the Federation. He took a deep interest in developing this work, and during a visit to this country strongly recommended it to the churches here. Since the death of Dr. Dale, Dr. Berry had been the acknowledged leader of provincial Congregationalists and his death will be severely lamented.

The Master Walks the Wave

HOW often in the gloomy days,
When clouds o'erhang the troubled wave,
When gales uplift the damping spray
And sport with spirits strong and brave,
Our wearied souls with labor spent,
Cling firmly to the cords of prayer,
And ride the billows confident
Their Master will sustain us there.

With troubled heart we see the surge
Rush madly on to overwhelm;
But through its breast our bark we urge,
For Christ, our Captain, holds the helm.
And gladness swells within the soul,
As we surmount the threat'ning wave
And feel it harmless 'neath us roll
At Jesus' word, like cringing slave.

When death, the last and worst of foes,
Shall come on sable wings of night
To threat us with eternal woes,
And sink our spirits with his might,
A voice shall reach us o'er the wave,
"'Tis I, my children, do not fear,"
And Christ shall stretch his hand to save,
And death and hell shall disappear.

Palm Tree Christians

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Feb. 26. Ps. 92 : 1-15

LIKE the palm tree, would be a simile full of meaning to an Oriental ear. In Eastern lands, the people call it the prince of the vegetable kingdom. It grows slowly, but at maturity is often eighty feet high. The trunk is erect and cylindrical, unbroken by branches, and is crowned by a cluster of long feathery leaves, which give a welcome shade to the weary traveler. Its stately, graceful beauty has been the admiration of all who have seen it. But it is not for its beauty that it is chiefly valued. Orientals have a catalogue of three hundred and sixty uses to which the palm tree is put. Among the products they get from it, are sugar, starch, wine, oil, wax, tannin, resin and dyeing materials. Besides these, they extract from it medicines, tonics and materials for the manufacture of paper and clothing. Its wood is used in building, and the dates which grow upon it are a favorite food. There is a legend current among the people of the lands where it grows, that when Adam was expelled from Eden, he was permitted to take three things with him. He chose as one of them, the seed of the palm. The others were an ear of wheat and a myrtle, the chief of the sweet-scented flowers of the world.

It is evident that the Psalmist presented a high ideal, when he wrote "The righteous shall flourish as the palm tree." How much happier and better the world would have been if the lives of Christians had borne a closer resemblance to the palm tree! Beauty and usefulness combined would have attracted people to the religion which produced such results. There have been many such lives, and the power which produced them is still accessible. Who has not seen in some home a member of the household whose quiet life and sweet cheerfulness have been a blessing to the others? Better than beauty of countenance, or of form, is the beauty of character which shines with the Christian graces of patience, gentleness, purity and love. There is no need for anyone to lament homeliness of face when it is possible to develop the loveliness of spirit, which plays a far better part in the family life. And it is so in the activities of the business world. There are men of sterling integrity, of kindly charity and unfailing magnanimity, whose beauty of character wins the respect and affection of all who come in contact with them. Their features may be rough and rugged, and their clothing may be poor and shabby, but they possess a beauty that never loses its charm.

When the righteous flourishes like a palm tree, he is not only beautiful but useful. Year after year the palm bears its fruit and at the last, gives itself to the service of its owner. So the Christian may bless the community in which he lives. His work is not done in the development of his own character. It is not merely that men may admire and love him that he is saved and changed. He must render service. There are sick persons to be visited and ministered to, poor people to be relieved, burdened souls to be strengthened and encouraged, lost souls to be rescued. As the palm gives food and oil and medicine and tonics, so the Christian has varied duties to perform. They involve labor and self-denial, the giving up of leisure and pleasure, but he does not count the cost. It is the natural manifestation of the life that is in him, the expression of the spirit of Christ. As a follower of him who spared not himself, but gave his life a sacrifice for the world, he is content to toil unnoticed and unknown, that other men may rise.

And there is another suggestion in the palm tree that explains all this. When the weary and thirsty traveler in the desert sees the palm tree in the distance, his heart is cheered, for he knows that water is near that tree. How good it would be if in this, too, the Christian flourished as the palm tree! If the world, seeing the beauty of his character and receiving his ministrations, perceived that it was from the water of life that he derived his power and charm, it, too, might seek that water which is free to all who thirst.

A Christian African Prince

How Young Somayou, of Bassaland Learned About Jesus- Educated in America

FROM a reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Mrs. Mary B. Wingate, of E. Corinth, Me., we are indebted for a very interesting account of a young, native African prince, who is now studying in this country with a view to a missionary career among his own people.

LEWIS PENWICK CLINTON

Lewis Penwick Clinton is a member of the Bassa tribe. He was born in Sankon, Western Africa, two hundred miles inland, back of Liberia. The Bassas are a powerful tribe, owning a coast line about ten degrees north of the Equator, and stretching two hundred miles south along the Gulf of Guinea. They are very superstitious. White represents, to their minds, the devil. The districts are ruled over by petty kings or chiefs of the tribes. They have no written language, but are possessed of excellent memories. One of their most revered heroes is Zea, grandfather of Clinton. He was a wise, brave, progressive man, though a savage. During his reign, war among themselves was wholly unknown. He was among the first kings of Africa to liberate his slaves.

Polygamy has long been practised, and a king's wealth was reckoned by the number of wives he had been able to purchase. There are various accounts of the number of wives who were buried alive with Zea. After his death, his favorite son ruled a short time and then died. Lewis, the eldest son of the favorite wife—only a babe at the time, was taken in charge by his grandmother and kept in secret, for his personal safety, in a place farther south, called Pankon. His uncle assumed command for the time being. Lewis' mother was also descended from a line of rulers. At his grandmother's death, Somayou (as Lewis was then called), ran away to the coast. He was then about twelve or fourteen years of age.

The coast, with its traders, rich, powerful, and fully clothed, had a wonderful attraction for the ambitious boy and, eluding his people, who tried to recapture him, he became errand boy to an English trader named Clinton, and took the name of Lewis Clinton. In less than two years, he was introduced to Bishop Charles Penwick, of the American Protestant Episcopal Mission, where he remained five years, taking the name of Penwick as a part of his own.

Seeing the wonderful advantage education and civilization confer, and having become a sincere Christian, an intense desire to help elevate and Christianize his own people took possession of him. An English missionary advised him to come to America and study at our institutions and obtain an education. Bishop Penwick gave him a letter of introduction to President Brackett, of Storer College, Harper's Ferry, one of the first schools opened for colored students after the Civil War. After five years of earnest study and one year of work, he entered Bates College, Lewiston, Me.

After three years in college, he entered Cobb Divinity School, of the same place, from which he graduated in May, 1898. The following August he was ordained, and hopes soon to return to his own people, and found a mission there. For years he has been in demand on the lecture platform, thus earning money towards his own support. As a student he shows certain limitations and some special adaptabilities. He has mastered seven or eight languages. His first thought and prayer are for his own people—that they may have the blessing of the Gospel. His education and self-improvement have always had that end in view.

GOUT AND RHEUMATISM...

A prominent physician writes:

DEAR SIRS:—Replying to yours on the use of TARTARLITHINE as a remedy in the treatment of gout, I will say that I have used it in the treatment of about a dozen cases with results that are a little less than wonderful. The characteristic feature of its action is the rapidity with which patients improve under its use. An improvement is noticeable within 24 hours. One of the most striking cases was that of a physician suffering from gout, muscular rheumatism and frequent bilious headaches. I prescribed Tartarlithine, and in one week, there was absolute disappearance of all of the uric acid manifestations. The nervous irritability disappeared, and he stated that he had done the best week's work which he had accomplished in years.

Burpee's Bush Sweet Pea

The First of an Entirely New and Distinct Race.

Natural-size Flowers of the "BURPEE'S BUSH" Sweet Pea.

The first of an entirely new and distinct race, as shown on the Colored Plate opposite page 12 of The Farm Annual.

BURPEE'S BUSH SWEET PEA grows in perfect bush form, as shown on our colored plate. It requires no trellis like the tall Sweet Peas; neither does it hug the ground, Verbena-like, as does the Cupid race. An average bush grows sixteen to eighteen inches high, by from twelve to fourteen inches wide. One of the largest plants, measured the past summer, was seventeen inches high, and branched so vigorously that it measured twenty-four inches across! All the flowers are borne on top of the plant, and the proper way to treat this new type will be to plant the seed in a row, to make a neat, even hedge, when no supports whatever will be required. Grown as separate, individual plants, the slight support of a light stick should be furnished,—just such as would be required for a dwarf, bushy Marguerite carnation. We predict that this "forerunner of a new race" will beget increased enthusiasm in Sweet Peas,—America's favorite flower.

The flowers, both in form and coloring, are a perfect reproduction of the famous Gray Friar introduced by us several years ago. As is well known, this is one of the most beautiful varieties in the entire list of Sweet Peas. Of good size and perfect hooded form, they are of a most beautiful watered purple on white ground, the heavier coloring being on the back of standard. Black-seeded, hardy and vigorous in constitution; the seed we offer is all handpicked, and every seed should grow.

With perhaps the single exception of Cupids, no novelty since the introduction in 1890 of Burpee's Bush Lima has such intrinsic merit, or is calculated to create so profound a sensation in the Horticultural World, as BURPEE'S BUSH SWEET PEA.

Per packet of 24 seeds, 25 cts.; half-size packet, 15 cts.

BURPEE'S NEW WAREHOUSE.

The new warehouse of W. Atlee Burpee & Co., a front view of which is given in the illustration, is seven stories high, of modern steel upon brick construction, with frontage on both Fifth street and York Avenue, Philadelphia, Pa., of light pressed brick and terra-cotta.

The offices occupy the entire frontage on the ground floor on the Fifth Street side, while the receiving and shipping of goods is handled on the York Avenue side, where are located the elevator shaft and the shipping clerk's office.

The second floor is devoted to the flower-seed and mail-order departments. The third floor contains the seed-papering and steam printing rooms [illegible] extensive shelving for the storage of seeds done up in packages. The fourth floor is given up entirely to the freight and wholesale order departments.

A visit to this new warehouse is an education in itself, in the matter of demonstrating how an extensive business can be conducted on the highest systematic lines. The utmost system prevails here, from the entering of the orders until the time the goods are delivered for mail, freight or express. Every variety of seed catalogued has its [illegible] spot in the various departments, and the arithmetical arrangement of the compartments renders comparatively light the work of filling the enormous number of orders received. Seeds are put up, according to necessity, in pints, quarts, or [illegible], and stored in these shelves to await the rush. Telephonic communication extends to every floor, each one of which is thus connected with the other; in fact, the whole interior arrangement gives one the impression that everything has been provided that can in any way facilitate dispatch. A bag-filling machine is kept constantly at work, in addition to the large force of girls, who fill, close, and seal the packets of seeds, which guarantee to the recipient thereof that the stock within the packet is Burpee's seed.

Mr. Burpee has a private office on the ground floor; and an interesting feature here is the colored and other catalogue cover designs, together with the colored plates that have been distributed by the firm ever since they introduced that kind of work.—From THE FLORISTS' EXCHANGE, New York, Nov. 12, 1898.

Lowly Life in the Sultan's Capital

OUT-DOOR life in Constantinople, while differing from that in other European capitals, has a certain picturesque attractiveness that is found nowhere else. Whether in the streets of Stamboul, or in the active, bustling sections of Galata or Pera, the traveler sees a panorama of activity out-doors that must at once strike him as unusual. "The gentler sex" is not as much in evidence as in the cities outside the Sultan's dominions, for the Moslem women, save on certain days, usually stay at home, and the women of other faiths who are to be met abroad are comparatively few; but there is always, in fine weather, a fair sprinkling of ladies to be seen in the more public places, especially on the Galata Bridge. There, a steady stream of carriages, equestrians and foot passengers is constantly crossing, cloaked Moslem dames in snowy yashmaks (veils) beside women in European dress, Turks, Armenians, Greeks, Syrians, Hebrews, and almost every nationality under the sun, being represented in the throng. In the coffee-houses — which open out to the street — the patrons sit and observe the gay, out-door panorama, while taking their refreshment. Besides the more pretentious restaurants, there is, in the poorer quarters of the city, a multitude of smaller cafes and eating-houses at which the humblest may obtain a meal for a trifling sum. There are also many shops or stalls (like the one shown in the colored photograph on this page), where a cheap meal is sold to the hungry worker. At such stalls, small pieces of cooked meat stuck on wooden skewers are served to customers, and pilaf (boiled rice, which is kept warm in a large tin dish), together with a variety of vegetables, the whole making a nourishing mess. Water-carriers, porters, boatmen and itinerant handicraftsmen patronize such places. There are, also, many wicker-stalls, with pide and peksemit (unleavened bread and biscuit), cheese, curds, kekaby (broiled lamb or mutton) and similar appetizing dainties, and these are kept constantly moving from point to point, wherever the crowds are thickest. Of course, there is also a much better and more expensive class of restaurants, both in the bazars and elsewhere, and in these the finest of Oriental dishes are cooked and served to patrons who are abundantly able to pay for the best the market affords.

AN OUT-DOOR RESTAURANT IN THE STREETS OF CONSTANTINOPLE

A majority of such places have large, airy rooms, with windows that admit the cool air even on hot days. There the guests sit and sip their shekerli (coffee with sugar), and chat together or watch the sights from the windows. The cafe is the resort where all go to exchange the news and to tell each other the passing gossip of the capital. Most of the leading cafes in Constantinople are thoroughly cosmopolitan, and representatives of a dozen different races often may be found there at the same time in friendly intercourse.

Nationalities cling together in the Sultan's capital. There are streets, the restaurants in which are patronized mainly by Greeks, and others whose patrons are almost exclusively Armenians. All eat the noonday meal in the open-air. As a rule, they eat very sparingly of meat, the Turks being especially abstemious in this respect. The evening supper is always eaten at home in true patriarchal fashion, and in households of means, the most liberal hospitality is shown to strangers and guests.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

E. E., Gothenburg, Neb. I have asked a hard question of my pupils, and as they are inquiring, I ask of you the same question. Who is the smartest man now living? Some thought the [illegible] should think the man uppermost in science, literature, languages, music, and a wide view of what life should be, might be so considered.

The question is too broad to admit of a definite answer. If by "smart" is implied the [illegible] name John D. Rockefeller (probably the richest man); the Sultan, who has got ahead of "the European concert" so many times, or others of the same class. If in science, there are Edison, Tesla, and a host of others; and there are the great stars of statesmanship, literature, art, philanthropy, war, etc. For sheer breadth of view, Tolstoi might be said to stand pretty well to the front of men, though he lives like a poor peasant. We think the adjective "smartest" misapplied, and that "greatest" in the highest sense may have been meant.

Some have supposed that Jehoiachin was associated in the government with his father for ten years before his father's death, and that the writer of Kings gives the age when he began to reign alone, after his father's death. There are, however, difficulties in accepting that explanation. It is more probable that some early copyist of Chronicles mistook the Hebrew letter of eighteen for that of eight, which he might easily do. The writers who copied from him would continue his mistake. Before the invention of printing, when the only copies of the books were those made by [illegible] made and perpetuated.

Reader, Chestnut Hill, Philadelphia, Pa. What is a Satyr? Under this head in Smith's Dictionary the author says: "In the passages cited in Isaiah reference is probably had to demons of the woods and of the desert places; half men and half goats." Were there ever such creatures?

Satyr is derived from a root-word signifying [illegible] the type of the Satyr. The Persians, Jews and Mohammedans believed that the Satyr and other fabulous animals haunted the ruins of Babylon. They are purely mythical, and should be classed with gorgons, centaurs, winged dragons, unicorns and other fabled monsters with which imaginative writers people the waste places of the ancient world.

THE PROPOSED NEW EXECUTIVE MANSION AT WASHINGTON, D. C.

At the next session of Congress a bill will be introduced for an appropriation to build a new Executive Mansion at Washington. It will probably provoke lively debate. There has always been a strong sentiment against an elaborate or palatial Presidential residence. It is claimed that the present White House is too small for the comfort of a Chief Executive and family, and for the social duties he must fulfil. Mrs. Mary Foote Henderson, daughter of the late Judge Foote, of New York, and wife of an ex-Senator from Missouri, with the aid of Paul J. Pelz, architect of the Congressional Library, has compiled this design for a new White House, and it will be submitted to Congress with the bill for an appropriation for its construction. The new mansion will be of white marble. The State apartments will occupy the east wing, and the private apartments the west. The rooms above will be suites of chambers for the entertainment of distinguished guests of the nation. The living apartments of the Presidential family will be in the west wing. The surrounding grounds will be fifty-two acres in extent. The greater part of the proposed mansion, as well as the conservatories, will be devoted to public use i. e., for guests and for social functions.

According to Du Cange, an eminent authority, surnames were originally written, not as now, after the Christian name, but above it, and were thus properly designated supernomen, or "over-names." Hereditary surnames did not exist in England till after the Norman Conquest. They were then taken from locali- [illegible] Wright, Carpenter, Shoemaker, Baker, Carter, Palmer), personal peculiarity (as Black, Brown, Green, Tallman, Short, Stout), possessions (as Rich, Coat, Vest), or from any natural object that might be chosen (as Lemon, Fear, Apple, Nut, Wood, Bird, Tree, Flower, Root, Ash, Rivers, Mountain, etc.), and so on indefinitely.

A Mid-winter Trip to Lapland

By SHELDON JACKSON, D.D.,LL.D.

LARGE numbers of tourists have visited Lapland in summer, but only few have tried that Arctic region in winter. When, in the fall of 1897, news began to be received that the miners on the Yukon were short of provisions, and that there would be much suffering before another season's supply could be procured, it was a foregone conclusion that the reindeer would supply an important part in relieving them. Instructions were at once sent to the reindeer stations in Alaska to place every available reindeer broken to harness at the disposal of Colonel Randall, U. S. A., at St. Michael, for the freighting of provisions to the miners in the lower Yukon Valley. To reach and relieve those in the Upper Yukon the Secretary of War determined to send to Lapland for reindeer, sleds, harness, and expert drivers, as the winter ice had already closed the ports of Siberia, where reindeer had usually been purchased. Having been connected with the introduction of reindeer into Alaska from the beginning, I was appointed a commission to proceed to Lapland for the purchase of reindeer, and First Lieutenant D. B. Devore, U. S. A., military aid to Secretary Alger, was directed to accompany me as disbursing agent. We received our instructions December 23, and on the evening of the same day I left for New York, and on the following day held conferences with the managers of the several trans-Atlantic steamship companies centered in that city with reference to the transportation of the reindeer and Laps to the United States.

The Voyage Begun

In the evening I went on board the steamship Lucania of the Cunard line. At 6.30 A.M. on Christmas morning the steamer left the dock and started down the bay. The morning was clear and cold, and the steamer was encased in ice from the storm of the previous day. Sandy Hook was passed about sunrise and we were out at sea. The voyage of five and a quarter days was without any unusual incident. We reached London December 31.

On New Year's morning I received a telegram in London from Mr. William Kjellmann, Agent of the Department of the Interior, who had reached Norway, asking for funds. The Lapps, who alone have the reindeer for sale, are a semi-civilized people, unaccustomed to commercial methods. A would-be buyer must show his money and at least make a partial payment at the time of purchase. Hence Mr. Kjellmann could accomplish but little until he had funds in hand.

It was New Year's Day, and as no one could suggest any method of getting money to Mr. Kjellmann sooner than by mail, we decided in the afternoon that I should push on to Lapland with money.

A Sabbath in London

After breakfast, on Sunday, January 2, I took an omnibus across the city to Marlborough Place to attend divine service at St. John's Wood Presbyterian Church, my old friend Rev. Monro Gibson, D.D., pastor. As three Korean converts were to be baptized and received into the church before the morning service, I supposed that I had started in time to reach the church at 10.30, but the progress of the omnibus was so slow that I missed the baptism. Preaching service commenced at 11, followed by communion. The large house, with galleries on three sides, was packed full. At the communion service I assisted Dr. Gibson. After the distribution of the elements, Dr. Gibson briefly introduced me to the audience as the Moderator of the General Assembly of the United States, and at his request I gave a few words of greeting to the congregation. In passing the bread, the communicant at the head of a pew took a slice of bread from the plate, and, breaking off a portion for himself, passed the slice along the pew from aisle to aisle, while the ruling elder bearing the plate went on down the aisle, and upon his return from the rear of the church gathered up the fragments from the pew. This was a very expeditious method of distributing the bread among a large membership. Immediately after dinner I hastened to attend a three o'clock service in Westminster Abbey. The preacher of the day was Rev. Canon Wilberforce, who took for his text Romans 8: 29: "For whom he did foreknow he also did predestinate to be conformed to the image of his Son, that he might be the firstborn among many brethren." In the evening I attended the City Temple, the Rev. Joseph Parker, D.D., pastor. The large church and galleries were crowded to suffocation.

Difficulties in the Way

January 3d, I learned at the office of the Atlantic Transport Steamship Company, that the Department of Agriculture, of the English government, had recently issued a circular forbidding introduction into England of any stock from Norway and Sweden, to protect English cattle from the foot-rot which had broken out in Southern Sweden among some of the cattle. Not only was stock of all kinds forbidden to land in England, but ships carrying such stock to other countries were to be quarantined twenty-one days before being allowed to load other cattle to return to England. As this threatened to greatly increase the expense and difficulty of chartering a ship, I proceeded to the American Embassy, where it was suggested that I visit the British Department of Agriculture, and talk over the matter unofficially with the officer in charge and find out if any official action would be necessary. I found that the officer wanted was the First Assistant Secretary of Agriculture. He took much interest in the proposal to procure reindeer to relieve the destitute miners in the Yukon, and suggested that we secure a steamer not engaged in the cattle trade and take the reindeer direct from Lapland to America, which suggestion was afterwards carried out. Procuring a through ticket from London to Christiania, Norway, via Queensboro; Flushing, Holland; Gooch, Hamburg and Kiel, Germany; Copenhagen, Denmark; and Helsingborg, Sweden, at 8:15 P. M., I left the Victoria depot for Queensboro, which was reached at 10:25 P.M. I immediately went aboard the steamer Kouningin Regentes, that was to convey me across the channel. On Jan. 4th, breakfast was had on the steamer at 4 o'clock A. M., and at 4:45 I left the steamer at Flushing, and took the through car to Hamburg, Germany. At 10 o'clock A. M., the train passed out of Holland, and entered Germany, at Gooch, where baggage was inspected by the customs officials. At noon, dinner was served in the car compartment on a tray brought from the outside. The distinctive features of that portion of Holland, Germany and Denmark through which I traveled, was wind-mills with one and one-half story houses, with side and eaves but a few feet from the ground. Hamburg was reached at 4:45 P. M., and Kiel at 7:22. After supper, I went aboard a steamer which at midnight crossed from Kiel to Kosor, Denmark, reaching the latter place early in the morning. At Kosor, the baggage was again examined. At 10 o'clock we were in Copenhagen, where I changed cars for Christiania. At noon, we crossed from Helsinger, Denmark, to Helsingborg, Sweden, dinner being served on the ferryboat. At Helsingborg, my hand baggage was again inspected by the customs officer. After crossing into Sweden, snow fences with an oval pitch to make the snow whirl away from the track, began to appear on the railroad.

Through Sweden by Rail

It was in Sweden that I first encountered snow and signs of winter. The car conductor, upon coming to the compartment for the passenger's ticket, would first rap at the door, and upon the passenger looking up, respectfully lift his cap, then approach and ask the privilege of seeing the ticket; then, removing a coupon or punching the ticket as might be, return the ticket to the passenger and back out of the compartment, and at the door again touch his cap. After leaving Gotenburgh, at 6.50 P.M., the conductor brought me a pair of woolen blankets and a small pillow, of which I was expected to make a bed on the car-seat, which was about seven feet long. Sometime during the night we crossed the border between Sweden and Norway and was there awakened by the Norwegian customs officer who wanted to see the inside of my satchel. At 6.17 A.M. on a dark Tuesday morning we reached Christiania, Norway. As my trunks had been checked through from London, I went to the baggage-room and opened them for the inspection of the baggage officer, then giving myself in charge of the porter I was whirled away in a sleigh to the Victoria Hotel, where I found a well warmed, comfortable room. After breakfast I strolled around the streets until 10 o'clock, when the offices were opened and the day's business began. Christiania, the capital of Norway, was established in its present location by Christian IV., of Denmark, in 1624. It is the legitimate successor, however, of the mediæval town of Oslo, which was founded by Harald Haardraada about the year 1050. In the cathedral of the old town, James I., of England, was married to Anne, of Denmark, in 1589. The university was founded by Frederick VI., of Denmark, in 1811. It has five faculties with fifty-five professors, who lecture without charge to 1,200 students. The city is enriched with zoological, botanical, zootomical, ethnographical, and art museums, also with extensive mineralogical, physical and medical collections. Also a collection of northern antiquities and cabinet of coins on an elevation at the west end of the city. In the beautiful Slats Park stands the royal palace, a plain edifice with a classical portico.

A LITTLE LAPLANDER

THE MILKMAID AND THE REINDEER HERD

At 10 A. M. I presented the American consul, Mr. Henry Bordewich, of Minnesota, a letter from Secretary Sherman to American officials in Sweden, Norway and Denmark, to render all possible aid in securing reindeer. In company with the consul a call was made upon the Secretary of the Interior of the Norwegian Government, who gave me a circular letter to the Norwegian officials in Lapland, requesting them to extend all possible assistance in my enterprise.

The "Viking Ship" Visited

After the transaction of public business a visit was made to the Viking ship, preserved in the museum of the university of Norway. Although it was not the regular day for the admission of visitors, yet the presentation of a letter of introduction from the United States Commissioner of Education, opened the doors and secured me every possible attention. The old ship which was dug up in 1880 embedded in a body of blue clay, to which it owes its preservation, has a total length from stem to stern of 108 feet, with a breadth of 16 feet. To the mast in the centre, a large square sail was attached by means of a pulley. In the third plank from the top are sixteen rowlocks. The rudder was placed on the right side of the ship. At the foot of the mast mast was placed the wooden tomb chamber. The old Viking chiefs being often buried with their arms and their treasures in their ships. In the same room with the ship were a number of metal dishes, together with a portion of the bones of a chief who had been thus buried. After returning from the museum, hiring a sleigh and driver, a ride was had around the city and the evening was pleasantly spent with the consul and his family, with whom I found that we had many mutual friends in Minnesota.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

The Midnight Express Train

A Sermon by T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, Nahum 2: 4. . . . .

> The chariots shall rage in the streets, they shall justle one against another in the broad ways: they shall seem like torches, they shall run like the lightnings.

IT has been found out that many of the arts and discoveries which we supposed were peculiar to our own age, are merely the restoration of the arts and discoveries of thousands of years ago. I suppose that the past centuries have forgotten more than the present century knows. It seems to me that they must have known thousands of years ago, in the days of Nineveh, of the uses of steam and its application to swift travel. In my text I hear the rush of the rail train, the clang of the wheels, and the jamming of the car couplings. "The chariots shall rage in the streets, they shall justle one against another in the broad ways: they shall seem like torches, they shall run like the lightnings."

Have you ever taken your position in the night, far away from a depot, along the track, waiting to see the rail-train come at full speed? At first you heard in the distance a rumbling, like the coming of a storm, then you saw the flash of the head-light of the locomotive as it turned the curve: then you saw the wilder glare of the fiery eye of the train as it came plunging toward you; then you heard the shriek of the whistle that frenzied all the echoes; then you saw the hurricane dash of cinders; then you felt the jar of the passing earthquake, and you saw the shot thunderbolt of the express train. Well, it seems that we can hear the passing of a midnight express train in my text: "The chariots shall rage in the streets, they shall justle one against another in the broad ways: they shall seem like torches, they shall run like the lightnings."

I halt the train long enough to get on board, and I go through the cars, and I find three-fourths of the passengers are commercial travelers. They are a folk peculiar to themselves, easily recognized, at home on all the trains, not startled by the sudden dropping of the brakes, familiar with all the railroad signals, can tell you what is the next station, how long the train will stop, what place the passengers take luncheon at, can give you information on almost any subject, are cosmopolitan, at home everywhere from Halifax to San Francisco. They are on the eight o'clock morning train, on the noon train, on the midnight train. You take a berth in a sleeping-car, and either above you or beneath you is one of these gentlemen. There are 100,000 professed commercial travelers in the United States: but 500,000 would not include all those who are sometimes engaged in this service. They spend millions of dollars every day in the hotels and in the rail-trains. They have their official newspaper organ. They have their mutual benefit association, about 4,000 names on the rolls, and have already distributed more than $200,000 among the families of deceased members. They are ubiquitous, unique, and tremendous for good or evil.

I think commercial travelers can stand a sermon of warm-hearted sympathy. If you have any words of good cheer for them, you had better utter them. If you have any good, honest prayers in their behalf, they will be greatly obliged to you. I never knew a man yet who did not like to be prayed for: I never knew a man yet that did not like to be helped. It seems to me this sermon is timely.

Now you, the commercial traveler, have received orders from the head men of the firm that you are to start on a long excursion. You have your patterns all assorted and prepared. You have them put up in bundles or cases and marked. You have full instructions as to prices. You know on what prices you are to stand firm, and from what prices you may retreat somewhat. You have your valise or trunk, or both, packed.

Put in among your baggage some carefully-selected, wholesome reading. Let it be in history, or a poem, or a book of pure fiction, or some volume that will give you information in regard to your line of business. Then add to that a Bible in round, beautiful type—small type is bad for the eyes anywhere, but peculiarly killing in the jolt of a rail-train. Put your railroad guide and your Bible side by side—the one to show you the route through this world, and the other to show you the route to the next world. "Oh," you say, "that is superfluous, for now in all the hotels, in the parlor, you will find a Bible, and in nearly all the rooms of the guests you will find one." But, my brother, that is not your Bible. You want your own hat, your own coat, your own blanket, your own Bible. "But," you say, "I am not a Christian, and you ought not to expect me to carry a Bible." My brother, a great many people are not Christians who carry a Bible. Beside that, before you get home, you might become a Christian, and you would feel awkward without a copy. Beside that, you might get bad news from home. I see you with trembling hand opening the telegram saying: "George is dying," or "Fannie is dead—come home!" Oh, as you sit in the train, stunned with the calamity, going home, you will have no taste for fine scenery, or for conversation, and yet you must keep your thoughts employed, or you will go stark mad. Then you will want a Bible, whether you read it or not. It will be a comfort to have it near you—that book full of promises which have comforted other people in like calamity. Whether you study the promises or not, you will want that book near you. Am I not wise when I say put in the Bible?

Now, you are all ready to start. You have your valise in the right hand, and you have your blanket and shawl-strap in the left hand. Good-by! May you have a prosperous journey: large sales—great percentages. Oh, there is one thing I forgot to ask you about! What train are you going to take? "Well," you say, "I will take the five o'clock Sunday afternoon train." Why? "Oh," you say, "I shall save a day by that, and on Monday morning I will be in the distant city, in the commercial establishment by the time the merchants come down." My brother, you are starting wrong. If you clip off something from the Lord's day, the Lord will clip off something from your lifetime successes. Sabbath-breaking pays no better for this world than it pays for the next. Your employer, young man, has no right to swindle you out of that rest. The bitter curse of Almighty God will rest upon that commercial establishment which expects its employees to break the Sabbath. What right has a Christian merchant to sit down in church on the Sabbath when his clerks are traveling abroad through the land on that day? Now, I say if the Sabbath is good for the employer, it is good for the employee. Young man, the dollar that you earn on the Sabbath is a red-hot dollar: and if you put it into a bag with five thousand honest dollars, that red-hot dollar will burn a hole through the bottom of the bag, and let out all the five thousand honest dollars with it.

But I see you change your mind, and you are going on Monday morning, and I see you take the train—Pennsylvania, or the Baltimore & Ohio, or the Hudson River, or the Erie, or the Harlem, or the New Haven train. For a few weeks now you will pass half of your time in the rail-train. How are you going to employ the time? Open the valise and take out a book and begin to read. Magnificent opportunities have our commercial travelers for gaining information above all other clerks or merchants. The best place in the world to study is a rail-train. I know it by experience. Do not do as some commercial travelers do—as many of them do, as most of them do—sit reading the same newspaper over and over again, and all the advertisements through and through: then sit for two or three hours calculating the profits they expect to make; then spending two or three hours looking listlessly out of the window: then spending three or four hours in the smoking-car, the nastiest place in Christendom, talking with men who do not know as much as you do. Instead of that, call William Shakespeare, the dramatist, and John Ruskin, the essayist, and Tennyson, the poet, and Bancroft and Macaulay, the historians, and Ezekiel and Paul, the inspired men of God, and ask them to sit with you, and talk with you, as they will if you ask them. I hear you say: "I do wish I could get out of this business of commercial traveling: I don't like it." My brother, why don't you read yourself out? Give me a young man of ordinary intellect and good eyesight, and let him devote to valuable reading the time not actually occupied in commercial errand, and in six years he will be qualified for any position for which he is ambitious.

"Oh," you say, "I have no taste for reading." Now, that is the trouble, but it is no excuse. There was a time, my brother, when you had no taste for cigars, they made you very sick, but you persevered until cigars have become to you a luxury. Now, if you can afford to struggle on to get a bad habit, is it not worth while to struggle on to get a good habit like that of reading? I am amazed to find how many merchants and commercial travelers preserve their ignorance from year to year, notwithstanding all their opportunities. Remember the "Learned Blacksmith," who, while blowing the bellows, set his book up against the brick work, and became acquainted with fifty languages. Remember the scholarly Gifford, who, while an apprentice, wrought out the arithmetical problem with his awl on a piece of leather. Remember Abercrombie, who snatched here and there a fragmentary five minutes from an exhausting profession, and wrote immortal treatises on ethics.

Be ashamed to sell foreign fabrics or fruits unless you know something about the looms that wove them, or the vineyards that grew them. Understand all about the laws that control commercial life: about banking: about tariffs: about markets: about navigation: about foreign people—their characteristics and their political revolutions as they affect ours: about the harvests of Russia, the vineyards of Italy, the tea fields of China. When you are waiting for the train, hour after hour in the depot, do not spend your time reading the sewing-machine advertisements, and looking up the time-tables of routes you will never take, going the twentieth time to the door to see whether the train is coming, bothering the ticket agent and telegraph operator with questions which you ask merely because you want to pass away the time. But rather summon up the great essayists and philosophers, and story-tellers, and thinkers of the ages, and have them entertain you.

But you have come now near the end of your railroad travel. I can tell by the motion of the car that they are pulling the patent brakes down. The engineer rings the bell at the crossing. The train stops. "All out!" cries the conductor. You dismount from the train. You reach the hotel. The landlord is glad to see you—very glad! He stretches out his hand across the registry book with all the disinterested warmth of a brother! You are assigned an apartment. In that uninviting apartment you stay only long enough to make yourself presentable. You descend then into the reading-room, and there you find the commercial travelers sitting around a long table, with a great elevation in the centre covered with advertisements: while there are inkstands sunken in the bed of the table, and scattered all around rusty steel pens and patches of blotting paper. Of course, you will not stay there. You saunter out [illegible] the merchants. You present your letters of introduction and authority. You [illegible] Then, at the last day, there are two or three things you ought to remember. First, that all the trade you get by the practice of "treating" will not stick. If you cannot get custom except by tipping a wine-glass with somebody, you had better not get the custom. The old commercial traveler gives us his experience that made quite a fortune by "treating." [illegible] the house that goes to one way or the other.

Beside that, you cannot afford to injure yourself for the purpose of benefiting your employers. Your common-sense tells you that you cannot get into the habit of taking strong drink to please others, without getting that habit fastened on you. O, commercial traveler, though your firm may give you the largest salary of any man in your line, though they might give you ten per cent. of all you sell, or twenty per cent. or fifty per cent. or ninety-nine per cent., they cannot pay enough to make it worth your while to ruin your soul. Beside that, a commercial house never compensates a man who has been morally ruined in their employ. A young man in Philadelphia was turned out from his employ because of inebriation, gotten in the service of the merchant who employed him, and here is the letter he wrote to his employer:

"SIR: I came into your service uncorrupt in principles and in morals; but the rules of your house required me to spend my evenings at places of public entertainment and amusement in search of customers. To accomplish my work in your service, I was obliged to drink with them, and join them in their pursuits of pleasure. It was not my choice, but the rule of the house. I went with them to the theatre and the billiard table; but it was not my choice. I did not wish to go. I went in your service. It was not my pleasure so to do: but I was the conductor and companion of the simple ones, void alike of understanding and of principle, in their sinful pleasures and deeds of deeper darkness, that I might retain them as your customers. Your interest required it. I have added thousands of dollars to the profits of your trade, but at what expense you now see, and I know too well. You have become wealthy, but I am poor, indeed: and now this cruel dismissal from your employ is the recompense I receive for a character ruined and prospects blasted in helping to make you a rich man!" Alas! for the man who gets such a letter as that.

Again, I charge you, tell the whole truth about anything you sell. Lying commercial travelers will precede you. Lying commercial travelers will come right after you into the same store. Do not let their unfair competition tempt you from the straight line. It is an awful bargain that a man makes when he sells his goods and his soul at the same time. A young man in one of the stores of New York was selling some silks. He was binding them up when he said to the lady customer, "It is my duty to show you that there is a fracture in that silk." She looked at it and rejected the goods. The head man of the firm, hearing of it, wrote to the father of the young man in the country, saying: "Come and take your son away: he will never make a merchant." The father came in agitation, wondering what his boy had been doing, and the head men of the firm said: "Why your son stood here at this counter and pointed out a fracture in the silk, and of course the lady wouldn't take it. We are not responsible for the ignorance of customers: customers must look out for themselves, and we look out for ourselves. Your son will never make a merchant." "Is that all?" said the father. "Ah! I am prouder of my boy than I ever was. John, get your hat and come home."

But it is almost night, and you go back to the hotel. Now comes the mighty tug for the commercial traveler. Tell me where he spends his evenings and I will tell you where he will spend eternity, and I will tell you what will be his worldly prospects. There is an abundance of choice. There is your room with the books. There are the Young Men's Christian Association rooms. There are the week-night services of the Christian churches. There is the gambling saloon. There is the theatre. There is the house of infamy. Plenty of places to go to. But, which, O immortal man, which? O God, which? "Well," you say, "I guess I will—I guess I will go to the theatre." Do you think the tarrying in that place until eleven o'clock at night will improve your bodily health, or your financial prospects, or your eternal fortune? No man ever found the path to usefulness, or honor, or happiness, or commercial success, or heaven through the American theatre. "Well," you say, "I guess, then, I will go to — I guess I will go to the gambling saloon." You will first go to look. Then you will go to play. You will make $100, you will make $500, you will make $1,000, you will make $1,500—then you will lose all. Then you will borrow some money so as to start anew. You will make $50, you will make $200, you will make $600 — then you will lose all. These wretches of the gambling saloon know how to tempt you. But mark this: all gambiers die poor. They may make fortunes—great fortunes—but they lose them.

"Well," you say, "if I can't go to the theatre, and if I can't go to the gambling saloon, then I guess—I guess I will go to the house of infamy." Commercial travelers have told me that in the letter-box at the hotel, within one hour after their arrival, they have had letters of evil solicitation in that direction. It is far away from home. Nobody will know it. Commercial travelers have sometimes gone in that evil path. Why not you? Halt! There is a passage in Proverbs I hesitate to read, but I do not hesitate long: "At the window of my house I looked through my casement, and beheld among the simple ones, I discovered among the youths a young man, void of understanding, passing through the street near her corner, and he went the way to her house, in the twilight, in the evening, in the black and dark night. He goeth after her straightway, as an ox goeth to the slaughter, or as a fool to the correction of the stocks, till a dart strikes through his liver."

But now the question is still open: Where will you spend your evening? O commercial travelers, how much will you give me to put you on the right track? Without charging you a farthing I will prescribe for you a plan which will save you for this world and the next, if you will take it. Go, before you leave home to the Young Men's Christian Association of the city where you live. Get from them letters of introduction. Carry them out to the towns and cities where you go. If there be no such association in the place you visit, then present them at the door of Christian churches, and hand them over to the pastors. Be not slow to arise in the devotional meeting, and say: "I am a commercial traveler; I am far away from home, and I come in here to-night to seek Christian society." The best houses and the highest style of amusement will open before you, and instead of your being dependent upon the leprous crew who hang around the hotels, wanting to show you all the slums of the city, on the one condition that you will pay their expenses, you will get the benediction of God in every town you visit. Remember this, that whatever place you visit, bad influences will seek you out; good influences you must seek out.

O commercial travelers, I pray for you the all sustaining grace of God. There are two kinds of days when you are especially in need of divine grace. The one, the day when you have no success—when you fail to make a sale, and you are very much disappointed, and you go back to your hotel discomfited. That night you will be tempted to go to strong drink and rush into bad surroundings. The other day, when you will especially need divine grace, will be when you have had a day of great success, and the devil tells you you must go and celebrate that success. Then you will want the grace of God to restrain you from rollicking indulgences. Yes, there will be a third day when you will need to be Christians, and that will be the last day of your life. I do not know where you will spend it. Perhaps in your house, more probably in a rail-car, or a steamer, or the strange hotel. I see you on your last commercial errand. You have bidden good-by to the family at home for the last time. The train of your earthly existence is nearing the depot of the grave. The brakes are falling. The bell rings at the terminus. Lincoln Memorial University

An Institution which Gen. O. O. Howard is Trying to Make a Worthy Memorial of the Martyr President

A PROJECT having a double claim on the sympathies of the American public is now nearing realization under the management of that distinguished General whose name is deservedly honored as much in the records of the Church of Christ as on the annals of our armies—Gen. O. O. Howard. He, with a number of men likeminded, undertook some time ago, to raise an institution of learning in the South, which should appropriately bear the name of Abraham Lincoln, and should be a memorial to him. The institution is now in working order, and is capable of wide development. It is situated at Cumberland Gap, Tennessee, near the stone which marks the connection of the boundaries of the three great States of Kentucky, Tennessee, and Virginia. It grew out of a school established by the two devoted missionaries, Rev. A. A. Myers and his wife. After fourteen years of consecrated work in other parts of the Southern mountains, they reached in 1890 Cumberland Gap, and there by faith and self-sacrifice and prayer they planted their school. They called it Harrow, after the famous English school founded in 1571 by John Lyons, "to afford an education for poor boys." Nearly nine years have passed since then, and the school is now The Lincoln Memorial University.

ONE OF THE UNIVERSITY BUILDINGS

There was a pathetic reason for such an institution being made a memorial for President Lincoln and for Gen. Howard's interest in it. In his last interview with Lincoln, Gen. Howard received special charge of the freedmen and refugees of these mountains, a charge which was afterwards emphasized by Edwin M. Stanton, at Lincoln's request. The people in that district had suffered much during the war, and many of them were descendants of men who had done valiant service and borne much suffering in the war of the revolution, when the Indians on the one side and the British on the other had harassed them, broken down their bridges, burned their houses and slaughtered them without mercy. The veteran officers of our armies still remember with gratitude the services rendered by these hardy people, who gave them food and water on their march and who, in some instances, took the shoes off their own feet and gave them to the bare-footed soldiers. No wonder that the great heart of Lincoln was concerned for their welfare and recommended them to the kindness and tenderness of a General whose soul, like his own, could be moved by the spectacle of a great people suffering patiently and silently. To this day Gen. Howard feels the force of that commission, and is impelled to give his sympathy and help to any movement that promises to benefit them.

Traveling through this mountain region, Gen. Howard was impressed with the paramount need existing for educational facilities. The statistics of the eleventh census, showed that of the white population of the three States of Tennessee, Kentucky, and Virginia, the proportion of persons who had not been able to get even the rudiments of education was very large. In Kentucky it was sixteen in the hundred; in Tennessee eighteen; and in Virginia fourteen. Since that census was taken the conditions have doubtless improved, but much remains to be done. There are two millions of people in the region where the three States come together, and it therefore required a herculean effort to meet the need. The conditions of life are very hard there, consequently whatever was done must be at the cost of liberal philanthropists at the outset. But there is no way in which philanthropy can help those in need so effectually or with so little risk of sapping the independence of the beneficiaries, as by placing facilities for education within their reach. Of this Gen. Howard was convinced and the success that had already been achieved by the school already established by Mr. and Mrs. Myers, showed how heartily such facilities would be appreciated. The number of pupils was already three hundred, some of whom had been sent at a sacrifice to their parents, the extent of which God alone knew.

To develop this school, to make it an institution which should teach, not the ordinary English education alone, but give an industrial and scientific training which would improve the financial condition of the section and, above all, instil in the mind of every student, Christian principles, was the project to which Gen. Howard gave his time and his energies. He longed to make it a real blessing to the people, an institution worthy to bear the name of Lincoln and to be an appropriate memorial of his life. He organized a Board of Directors and gave the school a representative basis. The illustrations on this page show how much has already been accomplished. The possibility of acquiring at a low price the estate on which the Four Seasons Hotel was located, was an opportunity that seemed to be providentially furnished. It covered five hundred acres, and included a building originally designed for a sanitarium, in which two hundred girls and their teachers could be accommodated. That has now been secured, and it is found that the soil may be so cultivated as to add materially to the income of the institution. The deficiency in the purchase money amounted to fifteen thousand dollars, but so eloquently did Gen. Howard plead the cause, that friends who revered the name of Lincoln and felt like him a concern for the welfare of the people, contributed at once six thousand dollars. Nine thousand dollars have still to be raised to complete the purchase, and for this sum Gen. Howard appeals to the generosity of the Christian public. He believes, and with good reason, that there are multitudes in this broad land, to whom the possibility of rearing a monument to the memory of Lincoln, shall at the same time, in educating these people, fulfil a desire dear to Lincoln's heart, will come as a welcome opportunity of patriotic and Christian service. It will please some of these people to know that their gifts will have permanent recognition. In one of the university buildings, which bears the name of Grant and Lee Hall, there is a large room, on the walls of which the name of every contributor will be inscribed. Such a memorial will be deeply interesting. Students of generations yet unborn, will enter that room and will see there the names of persons whose gifts aided in placing a Christian, literary, and industrial education within their reach.

GRANT AND LEE HALL

Gen. Howard says in conclusion: "This effort goes far beyond the ordinary educational institution. It is founded with the distinctive object to afford thousands in the mountains the opportunities to become godly men and women by increasing not only their theoretic but their practical knowledge of affairs, and by developing not only the physical and the mental, but the spiritual being.

"The great desire of those of us who are engaged in this enterprise is to secure an endowment not only for the proper buildings and accommodations for at least a thousand students, but to endow professorships and scholarships, to be of assistance to intelligent young men and young women of promise.

"My age forbids that I should long remain with my associates, and this is probably my last call in the interest of a particular institution. My love for Abraham Lincoln, which grows with my days, and my love for children and youth must be my excuse for entreating liberal gifts. God grant that we may have enough to pay off all indebtedness before our splendid property or any part of it shall be sacrificed."

CHRIST FREEING FROM SIN

S. S. Lesson for March 5. John 8 : 12 ; 21-36. Golden Text, John 8 : 36

AFTER his teaching in the temple, which had so exasperated the Jews, the people dispersed every man to his own house (John 8 : 53). He who had "not where to lay his head," went up to the Mount of Olives, there, alone with the Father, to gather strength and courage for another day's service in the midst of elements so contrary, spirits so antagonistic to his life and teaching. "Early in the morning he came again into the temple, and all the people came unto him; and he sat down and taught them." The Scribes and Pharisees, failing in their attempt to apprehend him, made efforts now to make him contradict the teaching of Moses. A poor, miserable woman was dragged before him and made the subject of their question: "Moses in the law commanded that such should be stoned; but what sayest thou?" It was a deep laid plot, and these men made sure now they had caught the Lord Jesus in a trap. Jesus came to bring forgiveness, and had said that he that believed on him was not condemned, and yet he had always been loyal to the Scripture. How would he escape from the dilemma of being true to his teaching of grace and yet continue obedient to the law? Jesus was in no hurry to answer. Writing on the ground, "as though he heard them not," he listened for direction from above, and then said, "He that is without sin among you, let him cast the first stone at her." Let the law have its course, but who shall execute it? Let the sinless one throw the stone. The same presence which made it impossible for them to take him until his hour was come made it impossible for them to answer him. Convicted by their own conscience, they went out, one and all, and left Jesus alone, and the woman standing in the midst. They were condemned who had condemned her, and who sought to condemn Jesus. And he who came, "not to condemn the world," said unto her, "Neither do I condemn thee, go and sin no more."

Oh, how Jesus yearned after the people! How he longed that the cloud of death and darkness which was upon them might be dispersed, and that they might walk in the light! He knew himself to be the remedy they needed, and therefore said, "I am the light of the world; he that cometh to me will not walk in darkness, but will find for himself the light of life." "Thou bearest witness of thyself; thy witness is not true" [or is not certain] broke in the Pharisees. And the patient Lamb of God explained to them in words which are priceless to such as read them in the light of the Spirit, but which, to those men who were darkened by their own blind prejudices, seemed to be the height of sinful presumption. He knew the law, that the testimony of one witness was not admitted in a Jewish court of law; there must be two or more, and Jesus alleged, "I am one that bear witness of myself, and the Father which sent me beareth witness of me" (verse 18), and he told them the reason of their blindness, "Ye judge after the flesh:" the flesh cannot judge; it has no capacity for judging what is spiritual.

The poor, sinful, degraded woman whom they had condemned, went forth from the presence of him who is the Light of the World, to "sin no more." Something within her had told her that this man was true, and a greater work than the healing of the man at the Pool of Bethesda had been accomplished in her. But they who judged Jesus for the miracle of healing had no sense whereby to understand the miracle of grace. They had no eyes to see God, or they would have perceived something more than man in him whom they condemned. "Where is thy Father?" was the question. "Show us the Father," said a disciple later on, only to be met by the words, "Have I been so long with you and yet has thou not known me Philip? He that hath seen me hath seen the Father, and how sayest thou then, 'Show us the Father?' Believest thou not that I am in the Father and the Father in me? the words that I speak unto you, I speak not of myself but the Father that dwelleth in me, he doeth the works" (John 14 : 10).

"HE THAT IS WITHOUT SIN AMONG YOU, LET HIM FIRST CAST A STONE AT HER"

Judging after the flesh, having not the spirit, being impure in heart, they could not see God; they were suspicious of all which was out of the range of their carnal comprehension. "Ye neither know me nor my Father; if ye had known me (i. e., as the Son of God), ye should have known my Father also." "No man knoweth the Father save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son will reveal him" (Matt. 11 : 27).

But the Lord's time on earth was drawing to a close. He had much upon his heart; the question of sin must come to the front, and the words he should speak would be for future generations. His hearers were so blinded that they "understood not that he spoke to them of the Father" (verse 27) when he said, "he that sent me," although this expression was continually on his lips. Judging as they did after the flesh, they saw all things and heard them, as between man and man; God was "not in all their thoughts." With the Son of Man how different it was. He could say to the Father, "The Father hath not left me alone, for I do always those things that please him" (verse 29). Thus when he broached the subject of sin, their unawakened consciences lay slumbering still, their eyes were holden that they could not see him who spoke to them. God had drawn near in the person of his Son, and they knew it not!

LESSON POINTS

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers

DURING this visit to Jerusalem, our Lord came into contact with a different class of men from those to whom he had preached in the country districts of Galilee. These were men steeped in the law and tradition, fond of legal quibbles and subtle in argument. To them, in their metropolitan pride, it was an offence that this young Galilean, who had not been trained in any of their schools, should come to the capital and presume to teach. Some of them wanted to suppress him by violence, but others were content with trying to puzzle him and entrap him in argument. These latter were the men who brought the woman to him, as narrated in the earlier verses of the chapter. They stated her offence and asked him what her punishment ought to be, reminding him, at the same time, what Moses had prescribed. But this severe penalty had fallen into disuse. In those days a woman so offending was not stoned; she was divorced. Their object in submitting the case to him was to place him in the dilemma of either reviving an obsolete statute, or of advising a disregard of it, and thus placing himself in antagonism to the Mosaic law, which was a grievous offence. Christ's answer raised the subject from one of legal technicality into the larger realm of personal responsibility, and they were discomfited by the accusation of conscience. Christ then turned the incident to account in teaching the people who had witnessed it, showing them that the highest morality was not that of slavish bondage to the letter of the law, but that of the freedom enjoyed by the right spirit.

The truth shall make you free. Victor Hugo tells, in his famous work, the story of a man who was arrested for some trifling offence. While he was in prison [illegible] and had been vainly sought through France. The prisoner stoutly declared that he was not Valjean and that he had never been in prison in his life [illegible] It was decided that it was probable that he would be sent to the galleys for life. But at his trial, an old gentleman, the mayor of a large town, rose and confessed that he was Valjean, the escaped convict. He had changed his name, [illegible] business and had prospered. He hoped that he would never be detected. But when he heard that another man had been mistaken for him and was about to be punished, he had felt it his duty to come forward and tell the truth. The truth had made him free.

If the Son shall make you free. The Jews could not bear to see him break the bonds of the law which he came to fulfil. [illegible] worshiped a curiously marked caterpillar. He missed it one day and mourned over its loss. It had gone into its cocoon. By and by he found a butterfly [illegible] pillar. "Wretch!" he cried, "you have killed my caterpillar and eaten him," and he smote the butterfly and crushed it. He did not know that the butterfly was a new and higher life of the caterpillar, just as Christianity was the [illegible] Judaism.

The servant of sin. Two lads worked at the same factory. One of them, who had been piously brought up, refused to join his mates in their weekly carousal, which was held on a Saturday night after they had been paid off. His companion ridiculed him and urged him to put aside his mother's injunctions and to be a man. "These home restraints make a slave of you," he said. "I don't want that kind of liberty," said the other. Years passed, and the pious lad, grown to manhood, [illegible] met his old companion clad in rags. [illegible] he relieved him, and tried to reinstate him in society. But it was useless. "I cannot break off my old habits," said the miserable creature; "I resolve to be sober, but the demon drink has me in its power and will not let me go. I am a slave of the most abject kind. I know it will ruin me, and I expect it will kill me, but I cannot let it alone." Such slaves are to be found in every city, and in like bondage are the slaves of lust and greed.

Ye shall be free, indeed. How can knowledge give liberty? It can give liberty from the burden of superstition. There are ignorant people who suffer apprehension if they accidentally cross two knives, or see the new moon over their left shoulder, or do any of a score of things which are supposed to portend evil. But let them be educated and they are delivered from such nonsense. Then, the knowledge of fact may bring liberty. The newspapers, some months ago, told the story of a man who came back to this country, after an absence of seven years, to give himself up to justice as a murderer. During all those years he had been hiding himself in European and Australian towns, fearful of meeting an American consul or an American traveler who might recognize him. The burden at last became intolerable, and he resolved to come back and bear the penalty of his crime. But when he came, he found that there was no penalty to be borne. The man whom he thought he had murdered had recovered from his wound, and was then alive and well. If he had learned that fact earlier he need not have exiled himself. When he did hear it, that truth made him free.

GENERAL EATON

Porto Rico's "Bow of Promise"

Gen. Eaton Reports on the Condition of Our New Colony —General Illiteracy, but "the Children are Bright"— Schools Urgently Needed—Great Spiritual Possibilities

SEVERAL weeks ago General John Eaton, United States Commissioner of Education, sailed for Porto Rico, having a double commission. The first was from the United States Government, which had appointed him to report concerning the educational needs of the island; the second from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, for which journal he was to investigate fully and report as to the outlook for spiritual work there, and especially with a view to the speedy establishment of Sunday Schools at available points. Gen. Eaton's first letter is given below. As will be seen, the progress made is necessarily slow, yet the prospects are encouraging:

SAN JUAN, PORTO RICO, Jan. 28, 1899.

Editor "The Christian Herald":

Neither you nor your readers will doubt that on education depends the future of this island. What must be the initiative of this great agency, so nearly creative in its effect? For four hundred years, under the influence of law, both canon and civil, and administration, both political and ecclesiastical, and the increasing power of tradition, all things have been Spanish. The original European settlers were Spanish. The next largest element has been the untutored negro from the wilds of Africa, whose descendants are supposed to number nearly a third of the population. The next largest contribution is Corsican French, but all have been shut out from other than Spanish influences. Every motive has been brought to bear to guide and keep them under Spanish control. Religion has been made Spanish. Little or no other literature came in to modify this current. There are books and libraries—but only Spanish. The honors of learning were sought from the Spanish University; thence came the diploma to the lawyer, the physician, the pharmacist and the pedagogue. The humblest teacher seeking a career must have a Spanish certificate. A few studied in Paris, less in Germany, and still less in the United States. The educated class, therefore, which is very interesting and intelligent and considerable in numbers, could only be Spanish themselves and in their influence. The unrest of the last few years has been letting in more ideas from the United States, and occasionally you find a professional man, perhaps a doctor of medicine, who has been educated in the States and whose professional literature has come from the States, but he could not practice before his diploma was recognized at Madrid. The law of the courts was neither founded on the common law of England nor the statute law of the United States, but was Spanish in principle and practice, going back to the Roman juris civilis. The clergy were paid by the State and required to be pre-eminently Spanish in their teaching and influence.

What could the illiterate two-thirds or three-fourths of the population be? Beyond all this the Anglo-Saxon or dweller in the more northern latitudes must not forget the difference in heredity and climate; but no one who has studied various types of men and civilization can fail to see here elements and conditions of great promise—foundations on which it is possible to build a noble superstructure, recalling the triumphs and glories of the ancestors of these people. What, then, must be the initiative of the education which is to lead them to aspire to that promising future? Plainly, it cannot be found in any iron bedstead scheme. It cannot be projected from a dream. Education, the one thing which everybody in the States claims to know all about and is ready to direct, cannot be started here by that sort of men. Their start could only bring interminable catastrophe. The facts here must be studied; theory and practice must be fitted to them. The people are neither dull nor stupid. The children are specially bright. Suddenly the current of history, directed by Providence, has separated them from Spain—one of the most illiberal and tyrannical of governments—and joined them to the United States for the future, which we believe is leading mankind forward along the most liberal lines known among men. Some here cannot see in this any gain either for piety, liberty, or the characteristics of civilization. They will go to Spain or obstruct any change; but the most of the educated class see their opportunity. Their eyes are not behind their heads; they look to the future, and, with different degrees of alertness, are ready to go forward.

Human nature, with its modifications, is human nature the world over. The same great principles must control its progress here as elsewhere. Progress will be better when chosen than when resisted and forced. The motives which will control that choice will be mixed—they will not all be those of love for the better. The progress of no nation is along the straight line; it cannot be here. These variations will require patience and wise adjustments.

The new, higher sentiments will recognize a value in every child—a factor for good or evil to himself and society. The religious eye will see in him an immortal soul to be saved or lost—one whose redemption was purchased by the death of our Saviour on the Cross. Every child trained in the school five years, there, will be an entire generation of that period knowing the new freedom and its blessings and having a growing affection for them. The Spanish language is the special obstruction to all that is to come from America. English must be acquired as the medium for all that the new conditions are to accomplish. All the motives that conspire to draw the people towards the free institutions of America, and the religious will join the secular in the effort. Reason and conscience will become active in the movement, while it will not leave out of consideration the lower motives, such as selfishness and fear. The time has not passed when fear is the beginning of wisdom. The child will learn the language, but affairs cannot wait for five years an elementary school generation; adult minds must act. The initiative of education must be adapted therefore to all ages. What has been decided in these few days of this supervision in Porto Rico? The authorities charged with this responsibility—that is, the Insular Cabinet or the Secretary Fourento, under whom education is administered, and Gen. Henry, who is the final authority—have approved several initiatives; first, the establishment of an American library to receive documentary publications published by the nation, by the states and cities, and all publishers are invited to contribute of their books and magazines. It is to be administered under the Superintendent of Education and after the plan of the New York State Library, making loans to different cities to benefit all the people; second, elementary readers in English have been ordered. The regular teacher will see that the regularly assigned work is done by the pupils, and an expert English teacher speaking Spanish will visit each school twice a week and see that this work is faithfully done, the English correctly written and pronounced; third, maps of the United States will be placed on the walls, together with pictures of men and marked events, and patriotic song books introduced; fourth, all teachers now employed will be expected to learn English. New teachers will be preferred who understand English, and examinations for teaching and for diplomas from the Normal schools of the Collegiate Institute will include English; fifth, going to the United States by students for their education and by teachers to improve their qualifications is encouraged. For adults, in addition to the American library, the plans include public lectures on persons and events in American history, with the use of the stereopticon, and the organization of night schools for instruction in English for clerks and others in need of its daily use. The lack of money limits and embarrasses every plan. Only three schoolhouses belonging to the public have so far been reported in the island. Many pupils have no books, and depend altogether and completely upon the oral instruction of the teacher. Much money is overdue teachers. One teacher from a small town reported a thousand dollars due her.

The Superintendent has commenced work by meeting teachers and City Boards of Education, and has invited the organization of citizens willing to lay aside partisan differences, which are marked, and co-operate in these important affairs, and leaders of public opinion are already offering their aid with enthusiasm. Only one Alcalde or Mayor has so far declared himself opposed to schools. Gen. Henry is giving these movements every aid. He has ordered that books for the library and schools shall come by Government transports without expense, and free from the tariff which American goods still pay like all others.

Two religious enterprises have been started for the study of the Bible and for preaching. Either of them is worthy of assistance.

Aguinaldo's Forces in Full Retreat — Iloilo and Caloocan Captured by American Forces

THERE is now reason to hope that American supremacy in the Philippines will be established without further bloodshed. It is evident that the resistance displayed was the work, not of the people, but of a few ambitious men, of whom Aguinaldo was the leader. They are now apparently aware that their projects were futile, and that their only hope of saving their lives lies in submission to the American authorities.

GEN. ELWELL S. OTIS AND STAFF

The lesson was short and decisive. After the battle of Manila they made a stand at Caloocan, a town twelve miles north of Manila. It was strongly fortified, and was probably the most formidable place on Luzon, next to Manila. The American attack began with a bombardment by the fleet, led by the monitor Monadnock and the gunboat Concord, which sent their shells with true aim into the town. After an hour and a half of this iron hail, the order was given for Gen. Harrison G. Otis's brigade to advance on the intrenchments. It was received with cheers by our men and they set out with alacrity. The Filipinos apparently amazed at their coolness, scrambled out and made for the shelter of the town. But a detachment under the command of Major J. Franklin Bell, had executed a flank movement which was a surprise to the Filipinos. They hastily set fire to the town, flung down their weapons and fled. The American troops speedily extinguished the flames, and ran up the Stars and Stripes.

A still more important capture was that of Feb. 11, when Iloilo, the chief city of the Island of Panay fell into American hands. It has been held by the insurgents since Dec. 26, two days after it was evacuated by the Spaniards. Finding that the city could not be taken except by force, and not wishing to precipitate a conflict at that time, our troops have remained on the transports outside the harbor. It was welcome news to them that an attack was ordered. The Petrel and the Baltimore opened fire. The bombardment was so well aimed and so heavy, that the Filipinos realized the hopelessness of defence, and they set fire to the city and fled. American troops were promptly landed and extinguished the flames before much damage was done.

Bishop Potter Assailed

ONE of the greatest hindrances to the work of reform, is the disposition to controversy among those who are aiming for the same results. The deplorable thing about the battle of Big Bethel was that, deceived by a thick fog, a company fought with another company of the same regiment. A victory of that kind is a defeat. Bishop Potter, whose name is a synonym for everything patriotic, noble and Christian, has been severely set upon because he advocated a saloon for the working people. He only advocated that which in England has been a great success—a coffee-house or place made comfortable and attractive by temperance drinks, to which people might go and spend some of their time, which otherwise they might be tempted to pass in atmosphere scented with alcoholics. We need five thousand such saloons in this country made attractive by pictures and music and healthful menu.

To read the published tirades against Bishop Potter, you might think he had advocated whole menageries of that which biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder. On the contrary, he proposed the opening of moral establishments which might in some respects eclipse in attractions the palaces of sin. We must take things as they are, and remember that there are thousands of homes so utterly repulsive that men and women ought to have a place of occasional retreat. Multiply coffee houses like those so prevalent in England. Meanwhile, let us be slow to attack men who have long been fighting evil in their own way. Temperance men stop quarreling! If the phraseology of a man like Bishop Potter does not please you, assail his phraseology, and not his fidelity to all good enterprises. Such guns kick over the men who shoot them off.

The Ethics of the Hispano-American War

STRICTLY speaking, International Law is the golden rule applied to nations. Nations are only aggregated individuals: and as between individuals the law of benevolence requires us to do as we would like to be done by, so between nations. There seems to be this exception: Like individuals, nations sometimes fail to see what the law of benevolence requires. sometimes require a revelation from God. Spain might say: "The golden rule requires [illegible] it takes ten thousand years." "No," we reply, "the golden rule requires you to stop exterminating your poor, persecuted [illegible] hands off until we demonstrate whether [illegible] ing sentence against the oppression of man by man."

The fundamental principle of international ethics is, that as there is a law of right and wrong between individuals, there is the same law of right and wrong between nations. You say: "Yes, but only the strong nations can act out this ethics." Might does not make right. No, indeed: but might puts upon a nation the responsibility of lifting up the standard of right. You say: "All government of nations is imperfect. All nations live in glass houses, and throwing stones is dangerous business for such residents." This is not the question. Spain can not argue from America's abuse of the Indians and the Negroes and the Chinese, that she ought to be permitted to abuse the Cubans. Two wrongs, or three wrongs even, do not make one right. God requires of men to cease to do evil and learn to do well. He requires it of nations. A nation learning to do well has the moral right to champion the cause of truth and righteousness in the earth, whatever her past record.

When God has a work that needs to be done, he does not wait for perfect men or perfect nations. The Pilgrim Fathers, heresy though it seem to say it, were not perfect men. But their heart was perfect. They meant to do God's work in the earth. And that is why they took ship for this Western wilderness. And for precisely that kind of men the King of Kings was making inquiry in the earth. He seems to have said: "These are the people, straight from the prisons and persecutions of England and their exile in Holland. They will ill-treat the inferior races at first: but this wilderness must be subdued and this new economy of government must be set up. They are the people for it. They will sometime learn and practice righteousness at home. They will teach righteousness eventually to surrounding nations, to all the earth. I can do no better. I elect them, with their battles for freedom behind them and their unsolved problems of freedom before them, to do my work on this Occidental continent."

This is the charter we have from God. This is why we have fought the Spaniards, and wrested Cuba, Porto Rico and the Philippines out of their hands, to establish right in the earth. The act of declaring war against Spain simply on moral grounds is the grandest act in history. As the stars fought against Sisera, so steam and electricity, time and tide fought against Spain. Spain is now cashiering her heroes in command, because they surrendered. They were fighting against God in history. Balaam beat the poor beast on which he rode because she saw the angel of God in the way of her progress. Spain did not know that just such a messenger, with a drawn sword, disputed conclusions with her in the recent war. She had read the story of Balaam in vain.

The Ruler of all the earth was tired of Spain and of her long-continued abominations. And so it ceased to be a question of Sampson and Cervera. It was against the buckler of the Almighty that this once great nation cast herself in despair.

For Ten

new subscribers we will send, freight charges to be paid by the person receiving it, one set of 15 volumes of The World-Wide Encyclopedia, containing nearly 7,000 pages and 96 maps. The regular price of this Encyclopedia is $26.00 for the 15 volumes; we sold it for $13.00, and we make this great offer now because the sets which we are to send, while absolutely new and apparently undamaged, were slightly rubbed in the handling—a blemish perceptible only to the experienced eye of a publisher.

We are in receipt of numerous letters asking us to send free, either to the writers or to some Library, or to some poor friend in whom they are interested, one or the other of the books offered above. Occasionally the case warrants compliance, but in most instances it is an effort to shift from other shoulders the burden onto ours. Now here is the opportunity, by the putting forth of a little effort, to secure any book of your choice absolutely free, and to dispose of it in any manner you may choose.

The offers made above are more liberal, in most cases, than anything we have ever before attempted in this line, and these offers will positively be withdrawn on March 31st. They are made, as before stated, with a view to largely increasing our subscription list, and we feel confident that the liberal propositions here submitted will result in large accessions.

$100 Given Away

In addition to the above rewards, we will give $100 as follows to the persons sending in the largest number of subscribers during the month of March:

For the largest list of all,	$25.00
For the next largest list,	20.00
For the next largest list,	15.00
For the next largest list,	10.00
For the Six next largest lists, each $5.00,	30.00

MAKING A TOTAL OF TEN EXTRA REWARDS, AGGREGATING $100.

Letters postmarked after March 31st, 1899, cannot be counted to apply to this contest. Unless requested not to do so, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will publish in its second number in April, the names of those to whom the rewards were paid. Now, then, let us be up and doing!

Samoa Still Seething

LATER dispatches from Samoa than those mentioned recently in these columns, confirm the impression they produced. It is clear that the agreement between our Government, Germany and Great Britain to exercise joint control over the islands, is not working well. Germany frankly owns that her wish is to have sole management and that the tripartite arrangement is irksome. Some encouragement was given to this desire by Mr. Cleveland's administration which openly expressed indifference to Samoan affairs, and reluctance to carry out the terms of the treaty which secured the right of the United States to interfere. The present Administration takes a different view of its obligations, and is actively supporting the British view of the situation. The question now turns on whether the decision of the Chief Justice, who is an American, shall be upheld. He decided that Malietoa Tanu, the son of the late king, should succeed his father. He would not accept Mataafa because that aspirant was, in his opinion, barred out by the Berlin treaty. It is a curious fact that this exclusion of Mataafa was decreed at the urgent request of Germany. He had offended the German Government by barbarously murdering wounded German sailors, and by other acts of savagery. But he has, evidently, in some way made his peace with his enemy, for it was on a German vessel that he returned to Samoa from exile, and it is the German officials who are now supporting his claim. That he has gained control of the islands and is de facto king, the American and British consuls have had to admit. The question now arises whether these two Governments will permit him to retain his position, or will use force to suppress him. It is conceded that the Samoans have the right to choose their own king, but if they choose one who is unfit to reign, and who will oppress the people and embroil them with other nations, the three controlling powers may do them a service by vetoing their choice. As ancient Israel found to its cost, the voice of the people is not always the voice of God.

The enemy shall pursue him: they have set up kings but not by me (Hosea 8: 3).

To Harness the Waves

A patent was issued last week to a citizen of New York, for an invention designed to obtain power from the tides. The invention consists of a float in the shape of a scow, on which are a number of tanks built one above another. The float is to be moored near an inlet, which will be closed by a dam at high water. A door in the dam will correspond with a door in each of the tanks, so that as the water outside the dam sinks with the ebbing tide, the tanks are brought one after another on a level with the door in the dam. Thus, by opening the door in the dam, the tanks are filled in succession. By the action of the high tide, they are again raised and emptied. From the passage of the water from the reservoir to the tanks, and from the tanks back to the reservoir, there is force enough generated, according to the inventor's statement, to turn a water-wheel, or operate an electric motor, or produce compressed air. In order to properly guide the float and to transmit the power to other machinery, the plan is to build a column in the bed of the water and to provide the float with a vertical shaft, in order to transmit the power of the rising and falling float to the machinery. This machinery is designed to convert the tide power into a driving force, as fast as a sufficient head of water is developed. The value of such a discovery, if it proves to be all that is claimed for it, cannot be exaggerated. Manufacturers, the world over, will appreciate the worth of a force which is unlimited, and can be turned to all kinds of useful purposes. In spiritual things, there is such a power, as Christ declared, but it is seldom used:

If ye have faith as a grain of mustard seed, ye shall say unto this mountain, Remove hence unto yonder place and it shall remove, and nothing shall be impossible unto you (Matt. 17: 20)

An Ancient Engagement

Among the heaps of literary waste at Oxyrhynchus, in which Grenfell and Hunt found the now world-famous "Logia," or "Sayings of our Lord," other documents have been found which shed light on the private life of the first century. The discoverers have just published a volume of translations of these documents. Among them are invitations to dine; a housekeeper's account of her expenses; an application from a lady to her friend to get some articles out of pawn for which she is paying interest at the rate of four per cent. a month; and a letter from a boy apparently at school to his father in such style as modern boys use. Another interesting document is a notice served on a lover, by the father of the girl to whom he was betrothed. It informs the young man that, "Forasmuch as it has come to my ears that you are giving yourself over to lawless deeds, which are pleasing neither to God nor man, I think it well that the engagement between you and my daughter Euphemia should be dissolved. . . . Wherefore for the security of the said Euphemia, my daughter, I send you this deed of separation and dissolution." There are parents in our time who know something of this trouble that this father underwent eighteen centuries ago. It is not, however, all who have his decision of character and are more careful about the moral character of their daughters' suitors than about their financial rating. But the Apostle's advice is still sound:

Be ye not unequally yoked with unbelievers; for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness (II. Cor. 6: 14).

A Convict's Marriage

The report of the marriage of a young lady of aristocratic family to a convict is published by the New York Herald. It states that the marriage took place near the convict stockade in Mobile County, Ala., recently. The bridegroom is a young physician who in 1895 committed a murder near Montgomery, Ala. He was tried and sentenced to ten years' imprisonment in the penitentiary. His head was shaved and he donned the convict's garb, but his medical knowledge and surgical skill saved him from menial work. He had sufficient occupation in caring for the health of the large number of convicts in the stockade. When the yellow fever broke out in 1897 the convict doctor volunteered to nurse the victims at Montgomery, and his services were accepted. The Governor gave him a thirty days' parole and permitted him to wear citizen's clothes. During this period he won the affections of the lady who has now become his wife. She knew that he was a convict, but it made no difference to her love. When at the expiration of his parole he returned to the convict stockade, she succeeded in getting a petition for his pardon signed by influential people, and personally pleaded with the Governor in her lover's behalf. The Governor could not be convinced that the culprit deserved executive clemency. Finally the lady lost hope, but her love had not diminished, and a few days ago, taking advantage of her lover's temporary freedom for a day, she visited him, in company with a justice of the peace, who married them. It is said that the bridegroom will not be released until he has served his sentence, but his wife declares that she will cheerfully await that time and will be true to him until he is free to claim her. Probably if any one had told this lady that she would ever marry a convict, she would have indignantly refused to believe it; but when love enters the heart it takes small account of former prejudices. It is only one more proof that the Apostle was right when he declared that it was the most potent of all forces.

And the greatest of these is love (I. Cor. 13:13, R.V.)

A SCENE IN APIA THE SAMOAN CAPITAL—A PROMINENT SAMOAN CHIEF

Her Life for Her Jewels

A melancholy incident is reported from Passaic, N. J. A few days ago a large brick house occupied by three families caught fire. It was discovered early in the morning before any of the inmates had left their beds. It started in the basement and spread from front to rear before they were awakened. When they heard the alarm they found that the way of escape by the stairs was cut off, as they were already blazing. They went to the windows in the front, and their eyes were soon gladdened by seeing the fire-engines come to the scene. The firemen reared their ladders against the house and began taking the people down one at a time. The safety of all seemed assured, and indeed it was thought at first that every one had been rescued; but, later, one of the ladies remembered that while they were waiting for their turn at the ladder, her friend ran to her room to save her watch and rings, which in her hurry she had left behind. She thought she would have plenty of time to go and return before the ladder was taken away. She was, however, not among the saved, and as the house was then a seething mass of flames, it was vain to think of rescuing her from death. Her charred body was found among the ruins after the fire was extinguished. Everyone can see that she was foolish to imperil her life to save her jewelry; but how many there are who, like the young ruler, are committing the infinitely greater folly of imperilling their souls rather than lose their property.

He went away sorrowful, for he had great possessions (Matt. 19: 22).

A Noble in a Rolling Mill

Among the men employed in the heat of the blast furnaces and rolling apparatus of one of the largest steel mills of Worcester, Mass., is a young man who is a scion of a noble family in Sweden. He works as hard as any man in the mills, dresses like them and lives on the same plain fare. The managers know that he is ready to do any kind of work and that he expects no consideration on account of his rank. His father is a prominent Senator in the Swedish Parliament, and some years ago was appointed Governor-General of the Capital. He enjoys the intimate friendship of the king, who has showered honors upon him. His ancestors have been famous in every generation in the history of their country. The young man who is now at Worcester expects to control a large iron and steel business which his father owns, and is fitting himself for its management by studying the methods in use in an American mill. He came here immediately after graduating from the University where he attained high honors. He expects to remain another year, and after leaving Worcester will seek employment in mills in other cities. Perhaps his experience as a workingman may teach him other things besides the methods which he came to learn. It may give him the power of sympathizing with his own employees, which he could have obtained in no other way. Even our Lord was qualified for his work by that means.

We have not a high priest who cannot be touched by the feeling of our infirmities, but was in all points tempted like as we are (Heb. 4: 15).

BRIEF NOTES

The oldest lighthouse in the world is said to be the one at Corunna, Spain, which, according to tradition, was erected in the year 100. It was re-built in 1634.

A series of Popular Bible Studies have been given recently at Elmira, N. Y., under the auspices of the Young People's Societies, which united with the Y. M. C. A. for the purpose.

An eight-page leaflet containing the testimony of army officers against the canteen system has been prepared for distribution among soldiers and sailors. It can be obtained, price sixty-five cents a hundred, from M. Emma Smith, 39 Perry street, Auburn, N. Y.

Thirty-three denominations were represented by the students in the Chicago Institute last year. The Presbyterians and Methodists divided equally between them more than one third of the total enrollment. Since the institute was founded, ten years ago, 1,785 men and 866 women have been enrolled.

Two-day conferences for the deepening of spiritual life have been held at Port Jervis, N. Y., and Warwick, N. Y., under the presidency of Rev. J. F. Carson, D.D., of the Central Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn. Among the speakers were Rev. Cornelius Woelfkin, Dr. A. T. Pierson and Rev. R. A. Walton.

Rev. C. H. Yatman is starting on a round-the-world Gospel tour. Leaving San Francisco by the America Maru, he goes to Hawaii, Japan, China, Australia, India, returning by way of Egypt, Palestine, Turkey, Italy, Paris and London. During his absence letters to him may be addressed to 140 W. 109th street, New York.

Mr. D. L. Moody has been holding meetings in Arizona at Tucson, Phœnix and Yuma. It is seldom that the miners have an opportunity of attending such services, and they flocked in great numbers to hear the famous evangelist. Mr. Moody went from Arizona to California, where he has held meetings at San Diego and Los Angeles. He will probably also visit Santa Barbara and Pasadena during his stay.

It is reported from Siberia that the bodies of three men, probably Prof. Andree and his two companions, have been found. A tribe of Tunguses, inhabiting Northern Siberia, are said to have informed the Russian police that they came upon a cabin constructed of cloth and cordage such as is used in balloons; close to it were the three bodies. The head of one of them was badly crushed. Prof. Andree ascended in his balloon on July 11, 1897, hoping to reach the North Pole.

. . . The Sidewalk Venders of New York . . .

TYPICAL SCENES FROM REAL LIFE IN THE GREAT METROPOLIS, PHOTOGRAPHED SPECIALLY FOR "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD"

OYSTERS A PENNY A DOZEN (BAXTER ST.) A SIDEWALK SCALE AND SHOP (ESSEX ST.) "HERE'S YER FRESH FISH" (FULTON MARKET)

IN every great capital, an element of attraction is the quaint and picturesque types of character that are found in the streets. The street cries of London and Paris are world-famous, and scarcely less so are those of Berlin, Vienna and St. Petersburg. Cosmopolitan New York presents a kaleidoscope as unique as any to be found in those cities. Here are to be seen types of every nationality, and in the multitude of street and sidewalk venders there is an abundance of variety to fascinate the artist and to excite the surprise and curiosity of the visitor.

On these two pages THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S photographer has given a series of scenes of this character that will be novel to many readers. His illustrations cover a wide district and include some of the humbler phases of open-air store-keeping. The sidewalk bake-shops, where stale bread is sold from a clothes-basket at a few pennies a loaf, are well-patronized by the poorer class of Italians and Hungarians, and occasionally by Chinese. The peripatetic oyster-stall, where the bivalves, "fresh from the bed daily," are retailed at a cent each, catsup and pepper included, is found in many convenient corners along the river front. A varied display of fish, lobster and other sea-food is found on many stalls in the neighborhood of the Fish Market at Fulton Street, and the trade is lively and profitable—especially on Fridays. The peanut man—like the hoky-poky man—is ubiquitous, and his light push-cart, with its charcoal roaster and its shrill steam whistle, is a familiar sight to all, and a special joy to the young folks.

Along Vesey and some other downtown thoroughfares one has to thread his way through a maze of street venders and peddlers. Here on the right are the sellers of Bibles, prayer-books, crucifixes, and rosaries. On the other hand are the sellers of dolls and dolls' furniture, "trick toys," and a variety of knick-knacks: fruit, cutlery, tools, hosiery, vases and lamps, cheap-framed chromos, stucco "busts" of famous personages (Washington and Dewey noticeably in the majority), and a great variety of other articles. Hester street (in the East-side Hebrew quarter) has its itinerant vegetable stalls, its sidewalk boot-and-shoe shops and its market wagons. The blanket-and-calico peddlers find here an active demand for their wares these cold winter days. This section is one of the most interesting of all. In Baxter street, [illegible] as the centre of the "old clothes" trade, there are still many queer-looking sidewalk "emporiums," dark and forbidding, where the unsuspecting wayfarer is invited to enter and buy a suit of clothing that has seen its best rivals does not always stop at mere words. Since the wave of improvement reached Five Points, many of the old tumble-down rookeries in that section have disappeared, but Baxter street retains nearly all of its old-time characteristics to-day. Mulberry street is another part of Lower New York that is full of suggestive activities. Movable stands and push-carts, with almost everything that can be sold for a few pennies, encumber the street and sidewalk. There is within the radius of a few yards, an odd agglomeration of cabbages, needles and thread, pretzels, wall-paper, dried meats, onions, footwear, live fowls, kitchen-ware, etc., which would make a stranger to such storekeeping stand amazed. And this singular confusion of industries is duplicated in a dozen other sections of the big city.

Almost as interesting as the street and sidewalk venders and their goods are the people who buy from them. Their customers are recruited mainly from the very poorest classes—the tenement-dwellers—to whom a dollar means a great deal. Unable to pay the prices asked at the regular stores, they buy from the venders who sell low, and who make it a rule never to let a customer go without selling him something. On Saturday night, the sidewalk dealers all drive a very lively sold at a figure within their scanty means. It would be difficult to estimate, with any degree of accuracy, how many thousands of persons derive support from the business of sidewalk vending, but it certainly reaches up into the tens of thousands. They are a class by themselves; yet there is a still lower one, the pack-peddlers, who are, however, not nearly so numerous.

There is still another class of street salesmen; its members are hardly regarded as rivals of the legitimate curb and sidewalk merchants whom we have described. They are the "fakirs"—the ephemera of the profession—and they frequent the busiest and most crowded sections of the city in campaign times and during the holidays. Few of them have stalls or push-carts, their wares being carried in their hands or upon a tray.

Street vending is a hard and laborious way of earning a livelihood. Sometimes, indeed, one hears of a stand-owner branching out as a regular storekeeper—as is occasionally the case among thrifty Italians—but these are exceptional. Poverty, hard, grinding poverty, is the lot of the average street-vender. He has his little seasons of success and failure, but the prices at which he is obliged to sell usually keep him on the dead level of a hand-to-mouth struggle for existence.

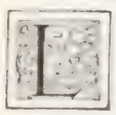
"A BEAUTIFUL POSSIBILITY"

A New and Charming Serial Story, Written Exclusively for "The Christian Herald"

BY EDITH FERGUSON BLACK

CHAPTER XVII



IVING the life of "an Alpine Christian," was an idea that fixed itself in Evadne's mind after it had been explained to her by her aunt's experience. It was a beautiful thought that the real life, the spirit's life, might be on so high an elevation that the troubles and vexations and annoyances of the daily experience could not disturb it. Was it possible to breathe that serene air to such an extent that no untoward circumstance could trouble its equanimity? Penelope Riggs seemed to be doing it. Aunt Marthe seemed to be doing it, too. That very day Evadne saw how her aunt was living that life. Mr. Everidge put it to the test at dinner.

"The ancient Egyptians, Evadne," he remarked, as he selected the choicest portions of a fine roast duck for his own consumption, "during the period of their nation's highest civilization, subsisted almost exclusively upon millet, dates, and other fruits and cereals: and athletic Greece rose to her greatest culture upon two meals a day, consisting principally of maize and vegetables, steeped in oil. Don't you think you ladies would find it of advantage to copy them in this laudable abstemiousness? There is something repugnant to a refined taste in the idea of eating flesh, whose constituent particles partake largely of the nature of our own."

"Why, certainly, Uncle Horace," said Evadne merrily, "I am quite ready to become a vegetarian, if you will set me the example. The feminine mind, you know, is popularly supposed to be only fitted to follow a masculine lead."

"Ah, I wish it were possible, my dear Evadne," said Mr. Everidge, "but the peculiar susceptibility of my internal organism precludes all thought of my making such a radical change in the matter of diet. Even now, in spite of all my care, indigestion, like a grim Argus, stares me out of countenance. It has been well said by my friend Professor Trenton, who, by the way, my dear Marthe, has promised to spend August with us"——

"Professor Trenton coming here in August!" cried Mrs. Everidge in dismay. "Why, Horace, you never told me you had invited him."

"My dear, I am telling you now."

"But I meant to take Evadne up to our mountain camp in August. I am sure the resinous air would make her strong. I had my plans all laid.

"'The best laid plans of mice and men gang aft agley,'" said her husband suavely. "Evadne's mental strength cannot fail to be developed by intercourse with such a clever man. We must not allow the culture of the body to occupy so prominent a place in our thoughts that we forget the mind you know. I think you had better let our guest have your chamber. He has a great liking for rooms with a Western aspect."

Joanna came in just then to announce the arrival of a visitor, whom Evadne had already learned to dread, on account of her continual depression.

"Oh, Aunt Marthe!" she exclaimed. "Must you waste this beautiful afternoon listening to her complainings? I wanted you to go for a drive."

"You go, dearie, and take Penelope Riggs. It will be a treat to her, and you ought to be out in the open air as much as possible."

"Evadne went slowly out on the veranda. Through the open window she could hear the visitor's ceaseless monotone of complaint, mingled with the soft notes of Mrs. Everidge's cheery sympathy.

"Oh, dearest father," she murmured, "if you had seen this beautiful life you would have known that there is no sham in the religion of Jesus!"

She waited long, in the hope that Mrs. Everidge would be able to accompany her, then at last she started for the Riggs cottage. She found the old lady alone.

"Where is Penelope, Mrs. Riggs?"

"Oh, skykin round ez ushul," was the peevish response. "It's church work this time. When I wus young, folks got along 'thout such an everlasting sight uv meetings, but nowadays there's conventions, an' auxils, an' committees, an' the land knows what, 'til a body's clean distracted. Fer my part I hate ter see wimmen a wallerin' 'round in the mud, till it takes 'em the best part uv the next day ter get their skirts clean."

"But there's no mud now, Mrs. Riggs," laughed Evadne.

"Land alive, child! There will be sometime. In my day folk used ter stay ter hum, and mind their childern, but now they've a all took ter soarin, and it don't matter how many ends they leave flyin' loose behind 'em."

"But Penelope has no children to mind," said Evadne.

"Land alive! She hez me, an' I oughter be more ter her than a duzen childern; but she ain't got no proper feelin', Penel aint. When I'm lyin' in my coffin, she'll give her eyes ter hev the chance ter rub my rheumatiz, an' run fer hot bottles an' flannels an' ginger tea. It's an ongrateful world, but I alwers sez there aint no use complainin'. It's what we've got ter expect—triburlation an' anguish an' mournin' an woe. It's good enuff fer us, too. Sech wurms ez we be!"

"Well, Evadne, how do you do, child? I'm dredful glad ter see you," and Penelope, breezy and keen as a March wind, came bustling into the room. "Why yes, I'm well, child, if it wasn't for bein' so tumbled about in my mind."

"What has tumbled you, Penelope?" asked Evadne, with a merry laugh.

"The Scribes and the Pharisees," was the terse rejoinder. "I've just come from a committee meeting of the Missionary Society, and I'm free to confess my feelin's is 'roused tremendous. Seems to me nowadays the church is built at a different angle from the Sermon on the Mount, and things is measured by the world's yardsticks, till there ain't much sense in callin' it a church at all. Ef you'd seen the way Squire Higgins' girls sat down on poor little Matildy Jones this afternoon, just because her father sells fish! Their father sells fish, too, but he's got forehanded, and can do it by the gross, an' so they toss their heads an' set a whole garden full of flowers a shakin' up an' down. They're always more peacocky in their minds after they get their spring bonnets. The Lord said we was to consider the lilies, but I guess he meant us to leave 'em in the fields, for I notice the more folks carries on the tops of their heads, the less they're apt to be like 'em underneath."

"But what did they say to her?" asked Evadne.

"You're young, child, or you'd know there's more ways of insultin' than with the tongue, and poor little Matildy is just the one to be hurt that way. Some folks is like clams, the minute you touch 'em they shut themselves up in their shells, an' then they don't feel what you do to 'em any more'n the Rocky Mountains, but Matildy isn't made that way. She just sat there, with the flushes comin' in her cheeks, an' the tears shinin' in her pretty eyes, till my heart ached. I leaned over to her an' whispered, 'Don't fret, Matildy, they aint wuth mindin'.' She gave me a little wintry smile, but the tears kept comin', and by and by she got up and went out, an' if she don't imitate the Prophet Jerrymi, an' water her piller with her tears this night, then I've changed my name since mornin'. I was so uplifted in my mind with righteous indignation that I felt called upon to let it loose, so I begun in a musin' tone, as if I was havin' a solil." ——

"A solil——" said Evadne in a mystified voice.

"Why yes, talkin' to myself, child. 'I did think if there was any place folks was free and equal, 'twould be in the Lord's service,' says I, 'the Bible teaches it's a pretty dangerous business to offend one of these little ones: I'm not much of a hand at quotations, but there's an unpleasant connection between it an' a millstone.'

"Malviny Higgins tossed her head an' give me one of her witherinest looks, but I m not one of the perishin' kind, so I kep' on a musin'. 'Its wonderful what a difference there is between sellin' by the poun' and the barrel,' says I. 'It's unfortunate that there's only one way to the heavenly country, and it's a limited express with no Pullman attached. The Lord hadn't time to put on a parlor car for the wholesale trade: seems like as if it was kind of neglectful in him. It would have been more convenient and private.'

"Malviny's cheeks got as red as beets, an' the flowers on her bonnet danced a Highland fling, as she leaned over to whisper something to her sister, but I had relieved my feelin's and could join in quite peaceful when Mrs. Songster said we'd close the meetin' by singin', 'Blest be the tie that binds'. Well, there'll be no clicks in heaven, that's one blessing."

"'Clicks,' Penelope?"

"Why yes, child, the folks that get off by themselves in a corner, an' thinks nobody outside the circle is fit to tie their shoe."

During their drive, in which Penelope was with difficulty persuaded to join, Evadne learned more of the trouble, but gradually Penelope shook off the vexation and recovered her equanimity.

Aunt Marthe was alone when Evadne returned, and the girl took her usual place on a low stool at her feet, and looking up in her serene face, she asked: "Aunt Marthe, what does it all mean—the victory of our faith, you know, and the overcometh in Revelation? I thought Christ got the victory for us?"

"So he does, dear child, and we through him. I came across a lovely explanation of it some time ago, which I will copy for you. It has been an inspiration to me. Listen: 'When you are forgotten or neglected or purposely set at naught, and you smile inwardly, patiently bearing the insult or the oversight—that is victory. When your good is evil spoken of, when your wishes are crossed, your tastes offended, your advice disregarded, your opinions ridiculed, and you take it all in patient and loving silence—that is victory. When you are content with any food, any raiment, any climate, any society, any position in life, any solitude, any interruption—that is victory. When you can bear with any discord, any annoyance, any irregularity or unpunctuality (of which you are not the cause)—that is victory.'"

"Now I see!" exclaimed Evadne; "it means the beautiful patience with which you bear aggravating things and the gentle courtesy with which you treat all sorts of tiresome people. Oh, my Princess, I envy you your altitude."

CHAPTER XVIII

Put to the Test

Professor Trenton had come and gone, and the glory of the autumn was over the land. The early supper was ended, and Evadne had ensconced herself in her favorite window to catch the sun's last smile before he fell asleep. In the room across the hall Mr. Everidge reclined in his luxurious armchair, and leisurely turned the pages of the latest Review. It was Saturday evening.

"Why, Horace, can this be possible?" Mrs. Everidge entered the room quickly and stood before her husband. Neither of them noticed Evadne.

"My dear, many things are possible in this terrestrial sphere. What particular possibility do you refer to?"

"That you have discharged Reuben? The sweet voice trembled. Mr. Everidge's tones kept their usual complacent calm.

"That possibility, my dear, has taken definite form in fact.

"But Horace, the boy is heart-broken."

"Time, is a mighty healer, my love. He will recover his mental equipoise in due course."

"But you might have given him a month's warning. Where is the poor boy to find another place? It is cruel to turn him off like this!"

"Really, my dear Marthe, I do not feel myself competent to solve all the problems of the labor question," said Mr. Everidge carelessly. "Reuben must take his chances, in common with the rest of his class."

But Horace, I cannot imagine what your reason for this can be! Where will you find so good a boy?"

My dear Martha, he [illegible] is too much disposed to jump to [illegible] conclusions to prove of any assistance [illegible] masculine brain, on the contrary, [illegible] time for calm deliberation, and [illegible] the pros and cons in the scale of a [illegible] any definite decision. But my reason [illegible] this case will soon become apparent [illegible] you. I do not intend to keep a boy [illegible]

"But who will take care of Atalanta? Are you going to forsake your cherished books for a curry comb?"

"Oh no. Atalanta has quarters provided for her at the Vernon Livery, and one of the grooms has orders to bring the carriage to the door at two o'clock every [illegible]"

"But Horace, if Reuben goes, Joanna will go too. You know she promised her mother she would never leave him."

"In that event my dear, you will have an opportunity to become more intimately acquainted with the mysteries of the culinary art," observed Mr. Everidge cheerfully. "It will be a splendid chance to evolve that finest of character combinations, Spartan endurance coupled with American progressiveness."

Mrs. Everidge smiled. "But what if I do not have the Spartan strength, Horace?"

"That is merely a matter of imagination my love. It proves the truth of my theory that necessity develops capacity. A woman of leisure, for want of suitable mental pabulum, grows to fancy she has every ill that flesh is heir to: whereas when she is obliged by compelling circumstances to put her muscles into practice, her mind acquires a more healthy tone. Self-contemplation is a most enervating exercise, and involves a tremendous drain on the moral forces."

"Do you think I waste much time in that way, Horace?" Mrs Everidge spoke wistfully, and Evadne, forced to be an unwilling listener to the conversation, felt her cheeks grow hot with indignation.

"My dear, I merely refer to the deplorable tendency of your sex," with which parting thrust Mr. Everidge retired behind the pages of his magazine.

Evadne could not bear to hear the cruel, selfish, inconsiderate man's talk. Tingling with indignation, she ran upstairs to her own room, and paced the floor with tightly clenched hands.

"Oh!" she cried: "what shall I do? I hate him! I hate him! How dare he! He ought to be glad to go down on his knees to serve her. She is so sweet, so dear! Oh! I cannot bear it! That she should be compelled to bear such servitude, and I can do nothing to help—nothing! nothing!" She threw herself across the bed and burst into a passion of tears. Was this the silent girl whom Isabelle had voted tiresome and slow?

A little later than usual she heard the low knock which always preceded the visit which she looked forward to as the sweetest part of the day. Could it be possible that Aunt Marthe would come to-night? Was no thought of self ever permitted to enter that brave, suffering heart? Evadne rose, and opened the door. The dear face was paler than usual, but there was no shadow upon the smooth brow. Marthe Everidge had crossed the tempest-tossed ocean of human passion into the sun-kissed calm of Christ's perfect peace.

Evadne threw her arms around her neck and laid her storm-swept face upon her shoulder. "Forgive me," she cried. "I heard it all. I could not help it. I think my heart is breaking. Do not be angry. You see I love you so! How can I bear to see you subjected to this? You are so tender, so true! You are so beautifully unselfish! Oh! my dear, my dear, how can you—do you bear it?"

Mrs. Everidge lifted her face tenderly and kissed the quivering lips.

"It is not I, but Christ, dear child. That makes it possible. When the first night you came, you asked me if I knew Jesus Christ. I told you he was 'my life.' That explains it all. It is very sweet of you to say the kind things that you have about me, but they are not true. In and of herself, Marthe Everidge is nothing. The moment she tries to live her own life, she utterly fails. If there is anything good about her life, it is only as she lets Christ live it for her."

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE

Old Age and Child-Life

Comradeship Between Grandparents and Grandchildren—A Blessing to Both

ONE of the sweetest and most wholesome influences, as a rule, in child-life is that exercised by grandparents. In many a home grandpa and grandma are the story-tellers, the play-fellows, the ever-ready sympathizers on whom the little ones can always count. Mamma and papa are toiling, planning, laying up for the children's education, for the children's future. Grandpa's and grandma's toiling and planning is past. They have more time for the small detail matters that make life sweet; they are no longer in a hurry. There is time to mend the broken toy or to comfort the loser; time to answer questions in leisurely fashion, and to be most patient with almost limitless inquisitiveness; time to read the pretty story-book aloud to a group of eager listeners; time to tie up stumped toes with due ceremony and sympathy; time to temper deliberation with judgment and jest while feeding bread and milk to the growing girl and boy, hungry from a romp, yet eager to be back to it. They have time to read the Bible to little folks; they know the prettiest child-stories in it—just those that children like—and are experienced in the telling of them.

How much good this gentle sort of teaching—that does not take to itself so serious a name—has accomplished in the world few realize. It could truly be shown that many an able preacher, many a devoted missionary has received his or her first prompting to a life of such usefulness, while listening to Bible stories at a grandparent's knee; others who did not choose these callings learned countless lessons of honesty and love, justice and mercy, that have helped them in business and social life. And what have the little ones given grandpa and grandma in return? They have given them back, in a measure, their youth, given them such love as no one else gives the aged—a love that sees neither defect nor sadness in bent form and white hairs, that supplements the stiff movements of age with nimble feet ready to run on errands of service. What feels so sweet to withered cheeks as the caressing pat of little palms? What sounds so sweet in ears, unaccustomed to such music, as baby's whispered, "I love you"? This comradeship between the aged and the young is one of life's most beautiful things. It is a blessing to both, and something to be cherished very tenderly. The twentieth century, called "The age of the discovery of the child," may prove in some new sense to be that of the discovery of old age, too. Age, having time for faith, hope and charity, has many lovely things in common with childhood. It has vast funds of experience which we ought to know how to utilize better than we do.

Domestic Service, Past and Present

"There was hardly anything else young women could do when I was young," Miss Eliza Houldsworth, an Englishwoman, 101 years old, is reported as saying of domestic service. "Now there are many occupations for them to earn money at. They have advantages I never had." One of these advantages—a very new one—is scientific training in domestic service, which Miss Houldsworth says was harder in her day than now. She was a domestic servant for fifty-three years, having only two mistresses during that time. In 1821, when she began, there were neither stoves nor ranges, no public bakeries to buy bread from, no carpet-sweepers, no ingenious appliances to perfect and lighten labor. Scrubbing and waxing floors was heavy toil. One night a week and every other Sunday out was impossible indulgence, to say nothing of an afternoon a week. Yet because of paucity of other occupations, servants were not difficult to get.

"Playing Like a Christian"

"I want you to remember to-day that you are a little Christian, Rob. Play like a Christian," whispered mamma in his ear, as he started off to school neatly cloaked and hatted, and with a good lunch in his bag. "Play like a Christian,"—that meant to Rob that he must be happy as happy could be, and that he must come home proud as a little king to rattle off to mamma a whole lot of things that had happened "just in the nick of time" to give him a chance to do something nice for somebody. They were very little things, of course, but mamma encouraged him to make much of his privilege of doing little things to make the world better. "I am so glad, my Rob!" she would say with shining eyes when he told of sharing his lunch with a playmate who had nothing nice to eat, how he helped another learn a lesson, how when "teacher" was worried, she smiled back to his loving look. "Here, mamma, is a flower-for you," is the way the story sometimes began. "I had two pennies, and the flower boy let me have two, and I gave one to teacher. She was tired, and I kissed her and gave her one, and told her I was going to bring you one, and she said, 'O Rob, you dear!'"

New Orleans Women and City Sanitation

The women of New Orleans are determined upon carrying through improvements in the sanitation of their beautiful city. The Era Club, at a recent meeting, took vigorously in hand the question of a plan for a thorough and effective sewerage system; and the press of New Orleans is throwing bouquets at the ladies for their interest in the matter. Women of New Orleans have suffered in their homes and dearest interests from the afflictions which have visited the Crescent City in the past, and with which we may reasonably hope she may never again be so seriously troubled. A tax is necessary to secure these improvements, and our sisters in New Orleans are doing well to lend a helping hand to their brothers in the matter of municipal house-keeping.

Married Women in Schools

The Sherwood resolution, that married women living with their husbands should not be accepted as teachers in Chicago's public schools, has created as much newspaper talk as any resolution that was ever presented to a Board of Education. Of course, the resolution was not adopted. There is an old regulation which, providing that preference be given to unmarried ladies and widows over married women applicants, the spirit of which regulation is just, but the operation of which is unfortunate for the woman who has children to support, and a sick or irresponsible husband. A rule now observed in Chicago requires the acceptable, married applicant to present the following certificate, signed by one of the eight district superintendents who have the education of young Chicago in charge:

I herey certify that Mrs. ——, a married woman whom I recommend for the position of——, is, in my judgment, better qualified for said place than any other candidate known to me.

Musical Filipinos

The Filipinos are so musically inclined that they have been called the "Italians of the Orient." They produce some fine hand-made stringed instruments. The Tagals possess some literature of their own, and their native songs are melodious. Tagal and half-caste ladies are fond of playing on the harp. Most Filipino women wear around the neck a little cloth bag containing a scrap of paper with the first fourteen verses of St. John written or printed on it in Latin. They call this "Evangelio" (the Gospel), and consider it a charm to ward off sickness. Of course, these remarks do not apply to natives of the interior, of whose ways Spain, who had owned them so long, knew little. America must give all these people a fuller and more perfect idea of God's Word. They need such help.

February Song

UNDER the snow, snowdrops are waiting,
Dear little snowdrops, pure little snowdrops,
Sure of the spring.
From the far southlands bluebirds have started
Hitherward on fleetest wing,
Sure that the sun will shine warm in our forests
When they come hither to sing.

In all the mountains, arbutus hideth,
Blushing arbutus, sweet-scented Mayflower,
Promise of spring.
Narcissus in gardens makes ready for waking,
The crocus its treasures will bring.
O, all things are sure of our Father's bright sunshine
The unfailing gold of the King!

Queen Victoria's Kitchen

ALMOST all cooking is done by gas in the royal kitchen at Windsor, although charcoal in braziers is used for some purposes. The Prince Consort took an interest in his wife's kitchen, for there is one little range designed by him for special roasts, to which charcoal gives excellent flavor. The kitchen is lit by electricity. Except that torches, candles and other ancient domestic appliances have given way to modern conveniences, the great kitchen, with roof so vast that there is hardly an odor of cooking, is practically as left by Henry III. who made extensive alterations in it, and to whom it owes its mighty dimensions. The room is filled with a white-capped army of master cooks, assistant cooks, roasting cooks, kitchen yoemen, kitchen maids, and other officials, all working so obediently and smoothly under the chef that there is no "clatter of tongues or pans." The chef is French, of recent appointment, of imposing appearance and marvelous dignity. One official, Mary Hows, the "necessary woman," occupies the most unique position on the staff, and one which is historical.

Copper pots and pans there are in plenty; they encircle the kitchen, and their array, as the ponderous door swings open to the curious visitor, is of blinding brilliancy and beauty. There are giant ranges, vast dripping pans, a wonderful serving-table of hollow steel, steam-heated, where dishes for each course repose until borne in to Her Majesty's table, the dinner of the Household, the Ladies in Waiting, the Nursery, the Steward's room, or the Servants' hall, as the case may be. There is no waste: according to ancient custom, tickets given out to the poor absorb what would otherwise be this, and provide food for many needy families. Besides the great room proper, there are numerous departments accessary to the kitchen, such as confectionery, pastry and bake houses, vegetable green kitchen and scullery. The population of Windsor Castle is a large one, and this mammoth kitchen, in which meals are prepared for so many people, would be an excellent laboratory in which to study domestic science—a branch of education in which Her Majesty's daughters have by no means been neglected.

The Picturesque Doukhobors

The Doukhobors, who lately arrived in Canada, and who left Russia because of religious persecution on the part of the Greek Church, are a picturesque people. Men, women and children wear sheepskin coats; men and boys fur hats, women and girls fur hoods. The skirts of the latter are of a red plaid pattern in woolen stuff. These peasants show the fruits of sober, virtuous, industrious lives in their robust physiques. They are tall, broad-shouldered, wholesome-looking. Their eyes, intelligent, sparkling, and kindly, are very attractive. It is a part of their religion to keep their homes clean and orderly. Most of them are vegetarians; their religion, however, does not forbid meat-eating. The children have very winning faces. When the Steamship bringing them reached St. John, N. B., members of the Women's Council were well represented in the crowd of friends awaiting the new-comers; they were surrounded with bundles, packages, boxes and barrels, containing many useful articles, among which the comfort of the little Doukhobors was abundantly remembered through their forethought.

Medical Volunteers for Africa

Two Members of the Church of the Disciples on Their Way to the Congo as Medical Missionaries

ONE of the most significant facts in the history of missionary work is the promptness with which a vacancy in the ranks is filled. No sooner does the news come that a missionary in some distant land has been murdered by the very people whom he sought to save, or has fallen a victim to the deadly climate, than some other consecrated soul offers to go to fill his place. If the missionary were well paid, or had the chance of making a fortune, or of being highly honored in the world's history, the cause of his going into danger would be obvious, but he can expect only a bare subsistence, he knows that he must work hard and that when he dies there is no fame or glory accorded to his memory. Some deeper motive there must be for his leaving country, home and friends to enter a service in which he may meet the fate of his predecessor, and can at the best hope for so little recognition. The motive is the one that Christians alone understand: "The love of Christ constraineth."

In November last news came that Dr. H. N. Biddle, who went in January, 1897, to Bolenzi on the Congo, was dead. He went to Africa, in company with Rev. J. Faris, to preach to the Balolo tribe, which is the most numerous in the Congo Free State. Immediately, several young men, who had consecrated their lives to missionary work, offered to go out and fill the place of the fallen soldier of Christ. The missionary board of the Church of the Disciples, to whom the offers were made, were deeply touched by the heroism of these young volunteers. It carefully examined their qualifications and chose Dr. Royal J. Dye, a young man who had been studying medicine under the care of Dr. George D. [illegible], the Medical Director of the International Medical Missionary Society. Dr. Dye is the grandson of one of the original founder sof the now flourishing town of Ionia, Mich., who went from New York many years ago, and settled in a comparative desert where only two families besides his own then lived. His grandson was born there, and it was there that a few weeks ago he was solemnly set apart for the work of a missionary.

Ionia has never seen a more impressive ceremony than that of this ordination. The church was crowded in every part with men and women who had known the young man from infancy. Rev. W. H. Scott preached a deeply solemn sermon, giving the young missionary his charge and exhorting him to fidelity and fortitude in his arduous work. At the conclusion of the service there was another interesting ceremony. Dr. Dye, on his appointment, had gone to Ionia and sought a friend of his boyhood, on whose affection he felt he could count. To her he told the story of his consecration and asked her to go out to Africa with him as his wife. She consented, and after the ordination service their marriage was solemnized. They are now on their way to the Congo, where they expect to arrive about the end of March. To the worldly mind the choice of such a career as that to which they have given themselves seems foolish. It looks like the throwing away of their lives. But they serve him who said: "He that loseth his life for my sake shall find it."

Dr. Biddle, whose place they have gone to fill, was a young man of singularly noble spirit. He was only twenty-five years old when he sailed for Africa, and he had just married a lady to whom he was deeply attached. He was a native of Cincinnati O., where he was educated and studied medicine. Soon after graduating he offered his services as a missionary to the Foreign Christian Missionary Society, but at that time the Society was unable to accept him. But he had laid his life on the altar, and he could not bring himself to take it [illegible]. He used the interval of delay as the truly consecrated soul uses disappointment, as a step[illegible] efficiency. He enter[illegible] for a post graduate [illegible] before he had com[illegible] Dr. [illegible] the Secretary of the [illegible] to which he had [illegible] him the welcome ne[illegible] He went out in the [illegible] the opportunity of [illegible] from the field shor[illegible] culties and hardsh[illegible] was happy in his work and was looking forward to more extended labor. Armenia's Orphans

Rev. Willis C. Dewey, a missionary of the American Board, at Mardin, sends an interesting report of the orphans under his care, many of whom are supported by readers of this journal. He writes:

[illegible] I found awaiting me here.

A Chat about Husbands and Wives

Matrimonial Worries—The Button Plague—A Modern Mrs. Jellyby

SPEAKING of John, the husband has certain rights; among them, that of having the comforts of his life properly attended to. "What is to be done," writes in plaintive strain a very much discouraged husband, "when a wife does not sew on her husband's buttons, darn his socks, nor mend his clothing, and when she is quite indifferent to his meals, for which he constantly makes ample provision?" What indeed? A case of this kind moves one's sympathy because the ordinary man is so helpless in the matter. His clumsy, masculine fingers cannot manage needle and thread; he does not know how to mend or to darn, and the loss of a button from a shirt drives him nearly frantic. I heard a husband say not long ago, "I have reduced the problem of the shirt to its lowest terms. There is literally nothing about mine which my wife needs to concern herself except the button-hole for the collar-button in the back of the neckband, and that the laundress often widens with her iron so that it will not hold the stud; yet, simple as this thing is, I cannot get it mended."

* * *

THE poor man evidently did not know that it is far from a simple thing to mend a gaping button-hole, and that the only way is usually to set a piece over the hole and make a new deal as to buttonholes, which is really an affair requiring nice care and skill on the part of the seamstress. Seriously, when people marry they should remember that in all probability there will come into their lives what may be called the plague of the button. A story is told of a man who committed suicide, leaving behind him a scrap of paper on which he had written this explanatory line, "Tired of buttoning and unbuttoning!" When I think of the perversity of buttons on shoes, on clothes, on gowns, on children's trousers, on little frocks and jackets, I am aware that civilization with all that it has given us, has greatly intensified the problems of life. Oh, for a lodge in some vast wilderness where buttons need never intrude. As buttons are here, however, and as women when they marry promise to look after the comfort of their husbands, a man certainly has a legitimate cause of complaint whose wife, whether because of women's clubs, or of intellectual improvement, or for any other cause, neglects to keep him properly fed, starched and mended.

* * *

NOT very long ago I heard a sad case of a man who lost his home which he was in a fair way of paying for because in an evil hour his wife found out that she could write poetry. From the moment that she discovered that she could match trees with breeze, and sighs with dies, she no longer took the slightest interest in domestic affairs. The children's faces were not washed; the chickens, instead of staying in their own place, sauntered into the kitchen and picked up crumbs in front of the hearth; the bread rose till it foamed over the top of the pans; nothing was done at the proper time while this poor woman, fancying herself a genius, wrote poems and stories by the hour. The inevitable result followed, and the modern Mrs. Jellyby ruined her husband's career.

* * *

ELSIE D. Try dipping your feet in cold water and rubbing them briskly to increase the circulation. If there is no other way of getting them warm at night, then put a hot water bottle in the bed and get the cold sheets warm before you lie down. In Italy they have a contrivance, a sort of little foot stove which is put into cold beds at night, and it is really a great comfort. At the same time, a person who is healthy and strong usually has a sufficiently good circulation to need none of these extra luxuries. Old people should always have them.

A FRIEND writes in a strain of some earnestness upon the loneliness which comes to a woman when her children are grown up and married, and she is left alone in the home not knowing precisely what to do with her leisure. If there is no outside work to enlist such a matron, why should she not undertake a course of study. Judging from the style of her letter, I imagine this lady an intelligent woman of fine capacity. It is not too late, on the sunny side of sixty, to undertake a thorough course of reading either in history, or some branch of literature, and if a woman is especially valiant, she might even attack with success a new language. Be careful to avoid sitting down and doing nothing; that of itself is enough to make one grow old too soon. The secret of keeping young is in adjusting one's self to affairs as one finds them, and keeping in touch with youth.

There is a lovely thought in the poem which follows, and perhaps it will comfort some who are finding the way a little rough and weary:

We live this day but once, dears,
And then all thought is gone;
We need not be a dunce, dears,
Though we must stay at home;
Though filled with grief and sadness,
Though tired with toil and pain,
Yet there is lots of gladness,
That any one can gain.

We live this day but once, dears;
Then make it gay and bright,
That we may have a chance, dears,
To sleep in peace at night.
Love makes a grateful feeling
A sweet and happy child,
And keeps our soul from kneeling
To passions dark and wild.

We live this day but once, dears;
Then make it bright and gay,
That we may still advance, dears,
Upon our heavenly way;
For if I drive off sorrow,
Wherever I should be,
Then God shall on the morrow
Great blessings send to me!

Margaret E. Sangster

A NEW

Digestive Principle

The leading medical publications of the country have been giving much space of late to a new element for digesting starchy foods. From many articles we take a selection from the Medical Times, New York:

"In these days of progress it is gratifying to know that cases of amylaceous (i.e., starchy) indigestion which have so frequently baffled us can now be treated with a reasonable hope of success. For years we have been looking for a diastase (digester of starch) more potent than that found in the malt extracts. It remained for Mr. Takamine, a Japanese chemist, to discover one of remarkable power. In this product, Taka-Diastase, we have what the profession has so long desired, and it is therefore not remarkable that many of the best men in the profession have investigated it, and the conclusion uniformly reached is that in cases of inability to digest starches we have in this ferment a reliable treatment."

Most of our food is starch—all vegetables are largely starch—yet when the stomach refused to digest starch, medicine has hitherto been powerless. Pepsin has been the backbone of all treatment of indigestion—excellent for meat foods but valueless for starch.

Kaskola Tablets are the only form in which this wonderful remedy is offered to the general public. We believe them a perfect remedy for indigestion and dyspepsia; they combine the meritorious elements of old treatments with the new Japanese discovery.

They are prepared solely by the P. L. Abbey Co., Kalamazoo, Mich., who will gladly send a regular size half-a-dollar box to any one sending name and address on a postal card, the agreement being that if the indigestion is benefited by their use, fifty cents shall be paid. If not, no charge will be made.

"But not until lately, when Tartarlithine has been employed by us, have we attained results that were even fairly satisfactory in the treatment of gout and rheumatism. By the employment of this drug I have been able to relieve some of the most distressing afflictions of this class, and now regard Tartarlithine as the most valuable remedy at our disposal in the treatment of this class of affections. In rheumatism and in gout Tartarlithine can be administered with confidence."

The Gates of Zion

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for Mch. 5. Ps. 87 & 100

EXPANSION is a word very familiar to us in these days, as our political leaders in Congress and the press have discussed the wisdom of acquiring territory far beyond our borders. The writer of these Psalms appears to have been considering a similar problem. But with him the aspect was a different one. It was not desire for the acquisition of territory that was stirring in his breast, but the principle of human brotherhood. The people of other nations, even of Israel's enemies, were to his prophetic vision no longer heathen, but participants in God's favor and love. He sees the gates of Zion flung wide open and a welcome extended to the Gentiles. A very unwelcome vision that was likely to be to his contemporaries. Long after his time it was with a very reluctant and grudging spirit that Gentile converts were admitted to a share in Israel's hope. It was then, as it is now in some Christian communities, a joy to many souls to think that God's flock is a very little one. The inheritance seems all the more precious because the heirs are so few and there is a disposition to keep the gates closed lest too many should pass in.

The Psalmist was a man of a wider view. He hears God mentioning Egypt and Babylon, the two nations which had crushed Israel between them, as containing people who were his, people who knew him. This was opening the gates of Zion very wide indeed. But it was not an indiscriminating admission. The men who were admitted were men who had been born again. It is to them that the gates are opened. The question asked of them is no longer as to nationality, but as to character. They are eligible whose hearts and lives have been changed, and there is no test as to race or station. It may surprise some exclusive brethren to notice that no distinction is made as to creed, nor ceremony. This and that man is born. So much and no more is demanded. For centuries after this poet saw the gates of Zion open, the churches have been trying to close them. All kinds of tests have been adopted. Applicants for admission have been asked if they have been baptized and confirmed, and if they believe this or that abstruse theological doctrine, and if their answers are not satisfactory the gates of that particular Zion have been closed against them. Even those who have been thus excluded, forming a church of their own, have set up their own tests and have proceeded to exclude others. It is well for us that the gates of the true Zion are not under the control of men. Those who seek to enter may be sure that no prejudice against race, or creed, or class, will operate to keep them out. True religion consists in being, in having the spirit of Christ, in that child-like disposition which seeks not its own glory, nor its own way, but submits to God in loving confidence. Of such is the kingdom of heaven.

The story is told of a man climbing a mountain in Scotland, seeing vaguely through the mist some object approaching him. In the uncertain light it seemed a fearful creature. But as it drew nearer, it proved to be only a man. The traveler, emboldened by the discovery, went forward and soon found that the object which had so terrified him was his own brother. Christians have been making the same discovery of late years. The mists of theological dogma blind the eyes and prevent recognition. We wonder that men can belong to a church whose creed seems to us utterly erroneous, and are surprised that they can worship in a way that seems to us superstitious, but if we could see into the souls of these men, we might discover that they are grappling with the same difficulties that we are struggling with, and that their intense desire is, like our own, to become more Godlike, to overcome sin and to attain holiness. They are traveling by a different road, but their spirit is one with ours. Why, then, should we refuse them the recognition and sympathy of a brother? The Apocalyptic seer saw the gates of the city of God wide open. The only barrier was against pollution. It was not the man whose creed was wrong, that was shut out, but the man whose heart was wrong, who loved his sin and could not forsake it, who could not enter in. These were excluded because they were not in accord with the spirit of the place. But to the true, earnest, loving soul who has learned to love Christ and to trust him, and has been born again in newness of life, by whatsoever name it may be known among men, there is ever a welcome at the gates of Zion.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has forwarded a large consignment of War Testaments for the use of our troops at Manila.

There is considerable destitution at San Juan, Porto Rico, and the Y. M. C. A. has opened a soup kitchen, where the hungry are fed daily.

The Mother's Congress

Many Interesting Addresses Delivered Before the Convention in Washington

AT the National Congress of Mothers, held in Washington, many addresses on timely topics were delivered and the programme printed in a previous issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD was carried out practically as announced. Two of the most interesting speakers were Rev. Josiah Strong and Dr. William H. Tolman, of the League for Social Service, New York. Dr. Tolman said that he had been studying factory systems, to learn what was being done toward the comfort and improvement of employees. There are instances where the employee is reduced to an animal and, like an animal, is supposed to require only enough to keep him alive. On the other hand, the employer has the opportunity of conferring a blessing, not only upon those who work for him, but upon their homes and the community at large. Such conditions as the latter were shown to exist in some great factories. Dr. Tolman illustrated his address with views of what the Van Markens of Delft, Krupp of Germany, the Levers of Sunlight, England, and the Cadbury Brothers, of England, were doing for the comfort and convenience of their employees. He quoted the philosophy of Richard Cadbury as typical, when he said:

We find that nothing pays us better than looking after the comfort of our employees, and certainly nothing gives so much zest to life than to see so many happy about us. The manufacturer has a great opportunity of adding a blessing or a curse to the homestead, where father, mother and children all participate in the plans and regulations made in the factory.

Rev. Dr. Strong's address dealt with "The Supreme Peril of Modern Civilization." It was substantially as follows:

There are three essential elements in every civilization: the material, the intellectual and the moral. As the material develops, there needs to be a corresponding growth of intelligence and morality to control it and to direct it to a moral rule. History shows that the safety of every civilization depends on the harmonious development of these three elements. Every civilization has tottered to its fall because the intellectual and moral—especially the latter—did not keep pace with the material.

The most marked characteristic of modern civilization, is its marvelous development of the material element. It is quite within bounds to say that that development has been greater during this century than during all preceding ages. There has been no corresponding growth of intelligence and morality. Materialism is, therefore, the supreme peril of modern civilization. And as we here in America have outstripped the remainder of the world in our material growth, materialism is pre-eminently the peril of the American civilization. The safety of our civilization demands the fuller development of our intellectual and moral life. If public opinion were right touching any reform—as, for instance, the saloon—and the popular conscience were educated up to the knowledge of what we all know to be true, the needed reform would be here straightway. The problem of every reform is how to educate and quicken the popular conscience. This is precisely what the League for Social Service was organized to do.

The League will aim to furnish mothers with the information which they are seeking to fit them for the most perfect discharge of their high duties; thus co-operating with them in their work upon the foundations of society, and in shaping the structure of the civilization of the future.

A Remarkable Life

The recent death in the Melbourne Benevolent Asylum of Mrs. Agnes Smith, aged 116 years, and Australia's oldest inhabitant, marked the close of an extraordinary life. Almost up to her death, she possessed her faculties unimpaired, reading without glasses and hearing perfectly. Her memory was remarkable. One hundred years after learning it, she repeated in her parlor at Melbourne, twenty verses of religious poetry which she had been taught to say when a little eight-year-old lassie in Scotland. She was born in Glasgow, the first daughter in a family of twenty-one children. She emigrated with her husband to what is now Victoria, New South Wales, in the 30's; and as they sailed up the river, natives came to the banks to look at them as the first white man and woman they had ever seen. She remembered many perilous adventures with natives of the Geelong tribe, being attacked by them five times. Before Melbourne was a city or was named, she was of those who welcomed its founder, John Fawkner, whose first cup of tea in the colony she made.

She gathered together the children of the first families of the settlement into classes for religious instruction, thus founding a Sunday School; assisted in building a church, and was, it is said, the first white woman who undertook the task of educating and Christianizing the aborigines. Her Bible was a precious and familiar story. Once a friendly visitor said: "We will read John 14." She immediately began: "Let not your heart be troubled," and recalled the chapter through. Another time, the twenty-third Psalm was suggested, and she said: "That was the one my mother taught me," and took up the words: "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want." Psalm 14 was her daily prayer.

Lost and Found

Luke 15: 4-6

AN hundred dear sheep in my tenderness shared,
But one had grown weary of home;
No more for my love or my blessing it cared,
But far from the shepherd would roam,
So precious to me was the sheep that was mine,
I breasted the storm and the cold,
And willingly left the dear ninety and nine
That strayed not away from the fold.

Afar in the desert, the lost one I found,
But weary and worn and distressed,
All footsore and bleeding from many a wound,
And I folded it close to my breast.
Dear lamb, I have journeyed in anguish, alone,
And sought thee with sorrowing deep,
But, oh! the Good Shepherd hath love for his own,
And "giveth his life for the sheep."

O, wonderful rescue, at wonderful cost!
It never can fully be told— [lost,
But it was my sheep, yes, my own that was
And now it is safe in the fold.
So glad and contented abideth my lamb,
I know that whoever may stray,
The lamb that I rescued will stay where I am,
And nevermore wander away.

The remedy is applied in the form of a medicated smoke-vapor inhaled from a pipe. By a simple process, which we explain in the directions accompanying the remedy, the medicine is made to enter the middle ear and every passage and cavity in the head, removing the disease from every affected part.

If you wish a sample and full particulars, testimonials, etc., write at once to Dr. J. W. Blosser & Son, 50 Broad St., Atlanta, Ga.

Death of Bishop Williams

THE Protestant Episcopal Church throughout the country suffers a bereavement in the death of its Presiding Bishop, Dr. John Williams, of Connecticut, which occurred on February 7. Though he had attained the age of eighty-one years, his keen interest in all public events and his delight in the company of young men, had made him seem younger than he was, and has rendered his death somewhat of a surprise. To the last he retained the vigor of his faculties as the students well know, who during his illness visited him and listened to his lectures.

Bishop Williams came of Unitarian stock, his parents who lived at Deerfield, Mass., being prominent in that denomination. It was while he was at Harvard, that the change came which gave to the Episcopal Church this distinguished theologian. He made an acquaintance with a fellow-student, which riped into an intimate friendship that powerfully affected his religious principles. At his graduation in 1838, he declared himself a convert to the doctrines of the Episcopal Church, and at once began a special study of theology with a view to taking orders in that church.

During his residence at Trinity, then called Washington College, the future bishop began the work which was through his life his most congenial occupation, that of college professor. He remained at Trinity after graduating until 1840 as tutor. He then spent a year in foreign travel. On his return, he accepted a curacy at Middletown, Conn., which he left after a period of service to become rector of St. George's Church, Schenectady, N. Y. In 1848 he was back again in his beloved Trinity College, this time as President. Three years later, however, he was elected coadjutor to Bishop Brownell, of Connecticut, and was obliged to curtail his college duties. The college, however, made him Vice-Chancellor. On the death of Bishop Brownell, he became Chancellor and full Bishop. His work then became very onerous, sorely taxing his energies. But he maintained his activity and even found time for some literary work. His Studies in the Book of Acts, and his Thoughts on the Gospel Miracles and his contributions to the Quarterly Review were widely read. In 1887, the death of Bishop Lee, of Delaware, made Bishop Williams the senior or presiding Bishop, in which office he is now succeeded by Bishop Clarke, of Rhode Island.

A Daughter of the King

A reader of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Mr. Charles Ellsworth Parker, of Germantown, Pa., sends us this beautiful incident:

One day after luncheon in one of the Central States—my home State—the Governor's daughter and I were sitting alone in the music room of the state parlors. She was a noble young lady, full of good works and deeds which were always done in a quiet, unassuming way. We had been talking some time when she told me that at college she was made president of the order of "King's Daughters," and had enjoyed doing some work among the fallen, calling upon the sick, the aged and the poor. Finding that it must have made a great many hearts happy and many to-day rejoice to know that such a distinguished [illegible] I asked her if she ever [illegible] the [illegible] Governor's daughter. She answered, in a modest, [illegible] manner, and with a look of [illegible] that I am the Governor's daughter." I then explained that I was a member of the King's [illegible] and in humility that we were [illegible]

[illegible] my own life, and I have thought that while [illegible] can be numbered as members of a State Governor's family, we can all become sons and daughters of the King of Kings. Though we may not always be recognized as such by the world, we shall some day hear him, our King, say: "Thou hast been faithful in a few things, I will make thee ruler over many. Enter thou into the mansions of joy which I have prepared for thee."

Thousands of sufferers on account of impure blood have endured hours of pain and spent much money for different medicines, after taking Hood's Sarsaparilla have been perfectly cured.

···CONSUMPTION

Happiness is the true end and aim of life, but without health there can be no happiness.

Invalids sometimes imagine they are happy, but they are not; they mistake a condition of resignation, forced upon them by protracted illness, for that of happiness.

Health and happiness are co-existent, the latter being entirely dependent upon the former.

Health may be defined as freedom from disease, sickness and pain. Freedom from pain, however, does not mean that we are healthy. The germs of a serious disease may be present in our body, undermining our constitution and sapping our very life-blood for weeks, months, or even years before we are aware of their presence.

The human body is a complex machine, delicately adjusted, sensitive to a high degree, and requiring constant care and attention to keep it in repair.

The balance-wheel is the spark of life whose vitality is generated, nourished and maintained by the friction between the process of decomposition and the work of reconstruction. This friction is indicated by what is known as animal heat, and is really and truly life itself; and any variation in the degree of this animal heat is an evidence of disease—evidence of the too rapid destruction of the vital tissues.

The natural tendency of all animal matter is toward decay, and when the vital forces, the life-sustaining elements, are not kept up to their normal standard by the processes of reconstruction the balance-wheel is thrown off its pivot and begins to wabble; there is "lost motion," the vital tissues are rapidly consumed and the body machinery is thrown out of gear.

This is the beginning of disease. The vital tissues are not being replaced as rapidly as they are consumed. The fuel is running out, and without fuel power sufficient to run the body machinery cannot be generated.

As the fuel is distributed throughout the human body by the blood, it is through the blood that the new supply must be furnished. In other words, the blood must be fed, purified and enriched. It is the life-giving and life-sustaining fluid upon which human life depends, and when it becomes impoverished all the vital organs, excretory and secretory, suffer and fail in their allotted functions, while the vital tissues shrink and waste away.

The vital forces become weakened to such a degree that they can no longer resist the invasion of the germs of disease, which soon find lodgment in the various organs and tissues, and wage a relentless war of destruction and death.

The lungs, being the most delicate and most exposed of all the vital organs, are usually the first to yield to such attacks. Coughs, colds, catarrhal discharges from the nose or throat, hoarseness and grip, are the first evidences that the forces of the enemy are being massed and concentrated in that quarter.

And if these conditions are not successfully combated by proper treatment, serious and, perhaps, fatal consequences will as surely follow as day follows night.

They are the forerunners, the advance guard of Consumption, that most formidable and fatal of all human maladies.

That Consumption is a contagious disease: that it is necessarily a fatal disease if not properly treated; and yet that it is a curable disease, are incontrovertible facts.

That the Dr. Slocum System of Treatment (consisting of Four Preparations) is a remedy for Consumption is also an equally well established fact, and a failure on the part of any sufferer from the dread disease to give this treatment a fair and impartial trial is certainly suicidal.

The treatment should be begun as soon as the premonitory symptoms of the disease are in evidence. A gradual loss of flesh, hectic flushes, loss of appetite, loss of nervous energy, loss of color in the face, deep-seated cough and chest pains are among the most suspicious symptoms and call for a course of the Dr. Slocum Treatment.

The Dr. Slocum System of Treatment embodies all the elements of both food and medicines. It feeds the blood and nerves, resupplies waste tissue, allays inflammation in the lungs, tones up the stomach, insures restful, refreshing sleep, and builds up the waste places throughout the entire body.

The Dr. Slocum System of Treatment is not an experiment in any sense; it has stood the crucial test in both clinical and private practice, and has never yet failed to accomplish all that is claimed for it, and even more. It has relieved thousands of cases that had been pronounced hopeless by the most prominent physicians in the land.

Its discoverer, Dr. Slocum, the world's most aggressive and progressive physician, has devoted more time, money and energy to the study and treatment of Consumption and other wasting diseases than any other physician, living or dead; therefore those who avail themselves of the opportunity of giving his System of Treatment a fair and impartial trial may rest assured that they get all that science and medical skill have to offer.

In addition to their extraordinary medicinal, therapeutic and food value the Four Preparations constituting the Dr. Slocum System of Treatment are the acme of pharmaceutical skill and excellence. They are carefully and scientifically prepared in the Doctor's own laboratories under his personal supervision and direction. Only the purest and most carefully selected materials are used in compounding them, and these are so accurately and scientifically blended that they act harmoniously and co-operatively, thereby insuring the very best results attainable.

Dr. Slocum, recognizing the fact that medicines and foods to be effective must be acceptable to the most delicate stomach, easily digested and readily assimilable, makes his preparations as palatable as it is possible to make without reducing their potency and effectiveness. Therefore they are easy to take, and their action is prompt and effective.

The Four Preparations consist of a medicinal, reconstructive building food, a revivifying, invigorating tonic, a superlative cough cure and a soothing, healing local application for the throat and nose.

No one medicine contains all the properties necessary for the successful treatment of Consumption and other wasting diseases. Dr. Slocum was the first to realize this fact, and, taking advantage of it, he so compounded his Remedies that they act harmoniously, successfully meet and combat all the symptoms of the disease.

Dr. Slocum has such abiding faith in his Treatment that he very generously offers to send it (Four Free Preparations) to all sufferers who apply by letter.

Own Your Own Home

And let it be in the most pleasant country in the world—

. . . CALIFORNIA

$250 . .

Will get for you { A HOME, A NEST-EGG, A COMPETENCY.

In The Maywood Colony Announcement No. 5 we asked those readers who desired further issues to fill out and return a certain coupon therein printed. As a result thousands of letters have reached us expressing an intense desire to get a foot-hold, or start in California. But we find that where there is one person with sufficient funds to acquire and develop 10 acres of land, there are 100 who are not. Hundreds have asked us to present some plan by which something smaller—something at lesser cost—could be had. We here present a plan that we feel will fill the demand.

LOCATION. Block 100 furnish our first complex or cluster of these villas—or home places. Examination of our general colony plat, which is found in each number of [illegible] west of the town of Corning, while Block 101 is just 40 feet farther west. Block 101 faces on the well-kept County Road leading from Corning to Red Bluff. The Corning public school is within easy walking distance of these two blocks, and the connecting avenues are as well kept as a street. Best Bicycle roads in the country.

SOIL. The soil of Blocks 100 and 101 is a loose, warm and friable chocolate colored loam, intermixed here and there with a small percentage of fine gravel. Just the soil in which the olive does its best. Surface is from perfectly level to gently undulating. Water in good supply and quality is found about 20 feet from the surface. Soil extends clear down to the water vein.

PLAN OF LOTS. Each of the 14 unsold 10 acre lots, as shown in Blocks 100 and 101, have been quartered from east to west, which is from right to left, making 56 of these 2 1-2 acre subdivisions. Since a 10-acre lot is 660 feet square, it will be readily understood that in quartering it equally, the four quarters each have a frontage of 165 feet and a depth of 660 feet. Look at the arrangement of the blocks and you will see that all of these 2 1-2 acre lots face on a 40 ft. avenue.

PLAN OF PLANTING. 210 two-year-old olive trees have been set on each of these 2 1-2 acre lots. The plan of planting is made plain by the accompanying diagram, each of the dots standing for a tree. As will be seen there are 7 rows of 30 trees each. These rows and the trees in each row are exactly 22 feet apart. The 7 rows of trees take up a strip of land 132 feet wide, leaving a margin of 16 1-2 feet on either side.

DESCRIPTION. As an example let us take Lot 5 of Block 100. The bottom, or south 2 1-2 acres, will be legally known as the south half of the south half of Lot 5, Block 100: the next sub-division on the north will be the north half of the south half: the next one, the south half of the north half, and the top 2 1-2 acre lot, the noth half of the north half—all of Lot 5 of Block 100.

PRICE. $[illegible] lots, also for the 210 olive trees planted thereon, and for thorough cultivation and care for the year 1[illegible].

TERMS. [illegible] want to reach every person who wants one of these lots. Our preference is for spot cash so that we can deliver Warranty Deed and close the transaction, but we shall be satisfied to take $50 as a first payment and $50 per month for four months. Or, we will accept $150 as a

The Opportunity for All.

Do not mistake this for a cribbage-board or a perous-plaster. It is [illegible] stand for that number of big, thrifty, 2-year-old OLIVE TREES planted [illegible] petency. The best life insurance policy that a man can leave his wife.

Bank of Tehama County

[illegible] Fort Bluff, Cal. January 25, 19[illegible]

TO THE PUBLIC:

For eight years Foster & Woodson, owners of "Maywood Colony," in this County, have carried an account with this Bank, and during that time we have attended to many commissions in the way of holding payments in escrow pending the execution and delivery to us of Deeds conveying property in said Colony to Eastern buyers.

In all such cases perfect Deeds have been made, and in the mutual interest of Mess. Foster & Woodson and those who would avail themselves of our services, we will, in all cases of cash transactions, receive such remittances, and proceed to secure deeds to such lands as may have been arranged for between the buyer and the sellers.

When it is desired that deeds be recorded before being forwarded to the buyer, the recording fee of $1.00 should accompany the purchase price of the property. Our service charge in such transactions is made against the account of Mess. Foster & Woodson.

We say in advance, and positively, too, that our regular banking business precludes the possibility of our entering into general correspondence with the public concerning "Maywood Colony." We can, as before stated, be used only as an agent through which to transact the business specified, but in no other capacity in connection with the "Maywood Colony."

Very respectfully,

E. W. Runyon
President.

Bank of Tehama County
M. F. Moore
Cashier.

ANNUAL EXPENSE. [illegible]

TAXES. [illegible]

APPRECIATION. [illegible]

PROFIT. [illegible] to attack the olive. The tree begins to fruit four years [illegible] expect $1 per tree. Eight-year-old trees commonly pay [illegible] True no one will make a fortune from a 2 1-2 acre lot, but after a few years they can have in it a self-sustaining home.

COMPARISON. If you have $250 laying in a sav[illegible] the trees, double in three years' time, or earn a sum equivalent to $83.33 a year as against $10 in the bank. We will admit that the bank is safe, but it is not so safe as a Warranty Deed to a piece of land—the foundation of all wealth. The rule is that $250 in bank will decrease in earning capacity, as interest dividends are diminishing from year to year. On the other hand the earning capacity of $250 invested in these villas will by the laws of nature, increase from year to year. $250 in bank is the cause of more or less anxiety lest the bank fail. $250 in one of these lots is a source of assurance that when all things else fail, you have a place to go to—a place in the most genial climate in the world—a place free from the regular monthly demand of [illegible] a place that within itself yields a competency and an independence.

UNPLANTED LAND. [illegible] cent standpoint, so far as we are affected, we very much prefer to sell these lots in bare or open condition: for it is from the sale of the land ALONE that we make our profit. We are compelled to combine the tree-planting proposition with land sales to effect the sale of our colony lands. Many buy who would not unless a plan could be entered into by which they could have trees set and growing while they are pursuing their regular business affairs. To illustrate why it is that we prefer to sell vacant land: You have $150 that you want to invest in such a proposition as we offer. Now if you would buy the bare land, your $150 would just pay for one of these 2 1-2 acre lots. By this deal we should have the full price of the land: you would hold your deed and the transaction would be closed and off our hands. But if you want the 2 1-2 acres with the 210 trees [illegible] we have to pay the Maywood Colonies Fruit Association $100 of the $150 received for their trees and planting labor. This leaves us but $50 on the land, and the balance of $100 we get in accordance with the terms of the purchase agreed upon. This explanation is given to show that it is for the accommodation of the buyer that the planting is pre-arranged. We have abundance of 2 1-2-acre vacant lots to [illegible] case, buy land this year, and have it planted next.

France Mourns Her Dead President

M. Faure Passes Away Suddenly at the Palace of The Elysee—General Grief in Europe—M. Emile Loubet Elected as His Successor

FRANCE is again plunged into mourning for the death of a Chief Executive. Felix Faure, President of the Republic, passed away suddenly in the Palace of the Elysee, on Thursday, Feb. 16th, after an illness of a few hours' duration, the cause of death being apoplexy. In the afternoon, while he was busily occupied in his study with M. le Gall, discussing certain Cabinet matters, he complained of feeling slightly ill. At seven o'clock he was suffering acutely, and M. le Gall, assisted by Gen. Belloud, led him to a sofa in the room, and immediately notified Mme. Faure and the official physicians. Dr. Leon Humbert, the first to respond, applied blisters, but the President grew rapidly worse.

When Drs. Lannelongue, Cheurlot and Potin arrived, a consultation was held. An examination soon disclosed the fact that the President was past human aid. The brain was suffused with blood, and it was evident that the end was approaching. M. Faure realized his condition, and continued to address those who gathered around his improvised deathbed. To his weeping wife and daughter, he said he felt his end at hand. "I am very ill; I am going!" he exclaimed, as his wife and Mlle. Lucie Faure entered the room. They knelt beside him, their tears falling unrestrained, and all present were greatly affected.

The President's strength was visibly diminishing and his movements were feeble, though his voice remained clear and perfectly audible as he bade his dear ones a loving farewell. He thanked his wife for the tender affection and devotion she had always shown to him, and gave a loving farewell to his daughters. His official associates and even his personal attendants were not forgotten. This ruler of a great nation, burdened with the largest responsibilities, though conscious that he had only a few moments to live, was yet so calm and confident as to the future that he could devote a portion of those last precious moments to loving and gracious messages to all he left behind, neglecting not even the humblest. It was a display of fortitude such as is seldom found, save at the deathbed of one who has already made his peace with his Maker. Creed and church apart, M. Faure was a good man. His life, both public and private, had been without reproach, and now that he lay dying, it was clear to all that he was sustained in those last moments by a Power greater than any the world could give.

THE LATE PRESIDENT FELIX FAURE, OF THE FRENCH REPUBLIC

Consciousness had now utterly fled from the patient, who lay inert and motionless on a mattress on the floor of the room that had for years been his official workshop. He was simply breathing. The physicians had exhausted every effort suggested by medical skill, but without avail. They had cupped and bled him on temples, neck and forearm, to allay the congestion, wrapped him in steaming flannels to restore warmth and circulation, and administered ether, oxygen and hypodermic injections; but there was no sign of returning animation. "We have done all we can," said the senior physician, Dr. Lannelongue, "and now let religion, to console the family, come in." Messengers were sent hurriedly out in different directions to summon the priests, but none of the prominent Catholic fathers could be found. After considerable search, one of the messengers—a soldier—found a poor abbe—"the humblest of the humble," and one who occupies the undistinguished position of chaplain to the House of Detention—and brought him to the palace. Until he arrived at the very gate, he had no idea where he was being taken. "The President is dying," said the soldier, as he bade the mystified Abbe Renault enter, and he added, "do what you can for him; he is not a bad man." The priest entered the death-chamber and performed the usual offices of his church and then

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

Bible Class Teacher, Chicago. I have been using one of your Art Bibles in my work and have found it very helpful. I wish every member of my class had a copy. There are ten of them. Could I get them or them or could I get them in cheaper bindings

We are glad to learn that you consider the Art Bible very attractive and very helpful to you in your Sunday School work. We can sell you ten of these Art Bibles—one for each member of your class—at $2.50 each, or $25.00 for the ten. We have but one style of binding—leather, overlapping, divinity circuit, with red-under-gold edges. We will send them singly to the separate addresses, charges prepaid, without extra expense to you.

If you will accept the same Bible with the cover slightly rubbed in handling, but almost imperceptibly so, you may deduct 75 cents, and send us $1.75 each. If you select the latter, please mention "Special" when you order. Two years ago this Bible sold at $12.00 each and by subscription only.

A. C. B., Kearney, Neb. Will you please be so kind to tell me where I can get the lecture delivered by Samuel Colcord, complete, in pamphlet form? Some extracts were published in THE [illegible]

Mr. Samuel Colcord's lecture, Reply to Ingersoll, is published by Wm. Hauptmann, 442 Columbus avenue, New York, N. Y., and will be sent post-paid on receipt of ten cents.

The supply of rare old Bibles does not seem to be quite exhausted, as the following letter from our readers show:

Sadie Goodenough, Farmingdale, N. J. We have a Bible, in old English, which was printed in 1580—the Geneva Version. The phraseology varies somewhat from the Authorized Version—for example: Psa. 23: 6 reads: "Doubtlesse kindnesse and mercy shall follow mee all the dayes of my life: and I shall remaine a long season in the house of the Lord."

Rev. A. W. Bill, Fond du Lac, Wis. The published notices by your correspondents about ancient Bibles are very interesting to me for two reasons: 1. Because I have two old Bibles. One, printed at London by Robert Barker and the assignees of John Bill in 1637, with the Psalms in meter, the music being printed in the "buckwheat" note style. On the New Testament title page is written: "Richard Wayte. His Book. 1758." This Bible was presented to me in 1893 by the Hon. Ledyard Bill, of Paxton, Mass. The other is a family Bible, 8 x 10 in., bound in oak boards, leather covered, with leather clasps, printed at London by Charles Bill, 1700. This Bible has the Old and New Testaments, with Sternhold and Hopkins' Psalms, "Set forth and allowed to be sung in all churches, of all the people together, before and after morning and evening prayers, and also before and after sermons; and, moreover, in private houses, for their godly solace and comfort, laying apart all ungodly songs and ballads which tend only to the nourishing of vice, and corrupting of youth." Printed 1698. This Bible was presented to me in 1874 by Mr. Edward Bill, of New York City. The other reason on my part for feeling an interest in these old Bibles and your correspondents' notes is because this John Bill is my ancestor.

Student. What is the cause of the rainbow assuming a semi-circular form?

A falling drop of water takes by its molecular force, a spherical form. The phenomenon depends upon successive reflections and refractions. When the red ray of the primary bow leaves the drop, it forms an angle with the sun's ray of about 42 degrees, and the violet ray forms with it one of 40 degrees; these angles are constant. Imagine a straight line drawn from the sun through the observer's eye. It would pass through the centre of the circle of which the rainbow is an arc. This line is termed the "visual axis." It is parallel to the rays of the sun; and when it is also parallel to the horizon, the rainbow is a semi-circle. We think he would. Apart from inspiration, the circumstances justified him. The women of Corinth were but newly emancipated from the restrictions of the time, by the teaching of Christianity. They were evidently inclined to make the most of their liberty, and their previous education and training did not fit them for it. Only depraved women made themselves conspicuous in popular assemblies, and when the heathen of Corinth saw Christian women doing so, they formed a low opinion of Christianity and, as you know, there was a scandal in the church. The Temperance Question . . in Palestine . .

. . . By SELAH MERRILL

THROUGHOUT the Old Testament there is repeated reference to Palestine as "the land of corn and wine and oil." These words meant to the Hebrews prosperity and gladness. To think of that fertile country in its present desolation makes the heart sick. The poverty of the land and the people must be seen to be realized. A summer visitant there finds the sky as brass, the earth as dust, the grass withered, and the streams dried up. But there is a brighter side; in spring the hillsides and fields are carpeted with flowers, and in the vintage season one forgets the wretchedness of the inhabitants and the distress of the country in the pleasure which bursts forth on every hand. Bright faces, pleasant words, social festivities, many signs of joy light up the dull lives of the peasants when "the fruit of the vine" begins to be gathered. Sadness is then turned into mirth and song. Of these three national blessings, which certainly were the nation's pride, the wine seems to have been thought of with the most joy and spoken of with the highest praise. This has been true of that country from the earliest period to the present time.

A number of questions arise at once in the reader's mind which concern the welfare of Palestine, and which, on that account, deserve our serious notice. For example: Who cultivates the vine? How is the wine produced? Is it used to excess? What are the sentiments of the Jews and Mohammedans in regard to its use? Human experience shows that a gift of God, which in itself is a blessing, may in the hands of sinful men become a curse. I find here and there the sentiment prevailing that the wine of Palestine is perfectly harmless. One of the most prominent writers and speakers in America declared, in a public address, "that the Bethlehem wines, the Jerusalem wines, and the Hebron wines were so light and unintoxicating that you must ordinarily drink twenty-four glasses to produce the slightest effect, even upon a person of nervous organization." I will not mention this writer's name, for I wish simply to present facts. I make the statement, which is borne out by all missionaries and scholars resident in the East, that at the present day no such thing is known there as unfermented wine, and the assertion just quoted, I am certain, is very far from the truth. Foreign residents in that country, who have the interests of the people sufficiently at heart to observe what takes place, know that thousands are injuring themselves by the use of native wine, although it is true that this does not contain such a large percentage of alcohol as some of the wines of Europe. Where wine is universally used it cannot be otherwise than that some persons are overcome by it. Many times have I heard missionaries say: "I wish I could persuade those young men to give up drinking." Were the native wines as harmless as has been alleged, and the drinking of them merely a social pastime, the anxiety of the missionaries would be uncalled for.

We shall be interested to look more closely at the vineyards and their fruit, the grapes and the wine, the habits of the people in regard to the use of intoxicating liquor, and the sentiments of the government in relation to the liquor traffic.

A few hundred yards south of the south wall of Jerusalem a field was being prepared for vines, and I secured an excellent picture showing a part of the process. The field was naturally very poor, and yellow earth, from some diggings near by, had been dumped upon it, so that it was fit for nothing but weeds. Here the owner, at intervals of about eight feet, dug holes which he filled with good soil, and in these he planted vines. In three years the land which was worthless had been transformed into a flourishing vineyard. The illustration shows men standing in the holes to indicate the depth to which they are dug. To a stranger, many of the hills of Palestine look as barren as a rock, but treated in the way now described they become fruitful and profitable. Were it not for the ruinous taxes, the culture of the vine could be indefinitely increased. Digging holes and filling them with good earth is the common mode of planting a vineyard. On the other hand, there is a great deal of land devoted to vines, which, because of its better quality, did not require to be treated in this way.

As a rule, vines receive very little care in the way of pruning and dressing the soil about them. The plough is sometimes run among them where this can be done without injury. They are sometimes trained upon the rocks, which abound everywhere, or upon piles of stone, and in some cases upon sticks, set in the ground for the purpose, but ordinarily they simply lie upon the ground itself. The vines live to a great age, and the separate branches resemble, when the leaves have fallen, small logs scattered over the field. The largest single trunk of the vine that I have ever seen in Palestine was the size of a man's body.

The grape season lasts from three to four months. Early in the morning donkeys with boxes filled with grapes, and women with baskets full of grapes on their heads begin to pour into the city. They go to private houses, to the convents, to the hotels, and wherever they have had orders, while many stop in the market place. These grapes are chiefly the so-called "white" variety, which we should call green, the "red" or purple kind being far less generally raised. Sweeter, nicer grapes could not be found elsewhere in the world. They are fresh and cool and have very few seeds, some of them no seeds whatever. The price is surprisingly low—that is, it is so to an American. A large dinner-plate full of rich clusters of grapes costs but four, five or six cents. There is never a trace of tartness about them for they are absolutely sweet. Of such fruit I do not think it possible for a person to overeat.

The grapes of Hebron have been celebrated since the Hebrew spies first entered the land (Numb: XIII), and small dealers in the streets of Jerusalem still sound the praises of the grapes of that section. A formula which a certain Moslem dealer used to repeat a hundred times a day was as follows: "I am from Hebron, my grapes are from Hebron, the camel that brought them is from Hebron, come buy my Hebron grapes." This he continued to shout out to the passers-by, although it was known that generally his grapes were brought not by a noble Hebron camel, but by a peasant woman from a local vineyard.

I have referred to the tax on vineyards. The tax is levied each year, and always early in the season, on the prospective crop long before the grapes are ripe. This method is unreasonable, arbitrary and unjust, but it is the custom and there is no redress. It sometimes happens that the yield is poor, in which case the grapes when taken to market do not bring enough to pay the tax; and the poor peasant has nothing for his labor.

The American "bar-room" is quite unknown in Jerusalem, that is, a brilliantly lighted room, with costly mirrors, gorgeous pictures, tables, beautiful glass ware, and every temptation that can be devised. The drinking places in Jerusalem would by Americans be considered strange and rude. There are a few small wholesale wine stores where also liquor is sold to customers, but in these there is no counter or table, not even a chair or stool to sit upon. Americans patronize the bar-room; the people of Jerusalem buy liquor of a dealer, take it home and drink it there. While there is no question on the part of the government as to the propriety of the sale and use of liquor, they interest themselves sufficiently in the matter to impose a tax upon every person who wishes to sell it. The government does not care to suppress the liquor traffic; on the contrary, it is very glad to encourage it because it can make it a source of revenue. At one time I made an official estimate of the number of places where liquor was sold, and to my surprise there were nearly one hundred and fifty, even in that small city. Generally a room in the house where the person applying for the license resides, is used for the sale of liquor, and a sum equal to one-third of the amount paid for rent for the house is charged by the government for the license. Some of the liquor shops are kept by Greeks, while a large number of them are kept by women, either Polish or Russian.

Somehow Americans involuntarily measure the amount of drinking in a given place by the general appearance of the men they meet on the street and the number of intoxicated persons whom they observe. Hence, when such Americans visit the Eastern city, where very few drunken people are seen on the street, they conclude at once that there is very little drinking in that place. They begin to discourse upon the "absence of intemperance in wine-producing countries," upon "the harmlessness of light wines," and even upon "the blessings of Mohammedanism in preventing the drink habit." In such assertions there is a little truth and a great deal of error. It is true that in certain portions of your large cities the misery and ruin caused by hard drinking are seen in the faces and dress of its multitude of victims. Such visible evidence is wanting in Jerusalem and other Oriental cities. It is also true that in one of your large cities a large proportion of the inhabitants do not touch liquor in any form, while in Jerusalem, among its fifty thousand people, there is not a teetotaler, except it be some of the missionaries and a few other of its foreign residents. In one of your cities there is a very strong public sentiment against drinking and drunkenness, while in Jerusalem nothing of the kind exists. The amount of wine made in Jerusalem and vicinity, the large amount of wine, arak, brandy, beer and other liquors that is imported into the city, shows that the consumption of intoxicating drinks there is very

DIGGING HOLES FOR VINES NEAR JERUSALEM

With regard to some of the villages, whose population is wholly Mohammedan, it is fair to say that intemperance is almost unknown. The Moslem religion prohibits the use of wine, and the habit of not drinking has been inherited from previous generations. That they do not drink has been attributed largely to this inherited habit. In the Mohammedan world, it will not do to ascribe to a man all the virtues we can think of simply because he never uses intoxicating drink. Moreover, the Mohammedan villagers are desperately poor, and could not purchase liquor if they wanted to. In America we say that "no one is so poor as not, in some way, to be able to get liquor." This is not true in Palestine. My observation is that Mohammedans, remote from the towns, do not drink partly because they are poor, but chiefly because neither they nor their fathers ever formed a habit of drinking. In the large towns where the drink habit is fastening itself upon so many Mohammedans, they refrain generally from the use of wine, since that alone is prohibited by their religion.

The reader is aware that many times in the course of these articles we have had occasion to say that the condition of things in Jerusalem fills us with sadness, and at no time is this feeling deeper than when we think of this once glorious city in connection with the demon of drink. What is to be done? As we have seen, no help comes from the government. Moreover, public sentiment offers no barrier to the spread of this evil. There are no societies or organizations to rescue those who have yielded to this degrading habit and who wish to break away from it. The worst drunkard I ever saw in Jerusalem was a Mohammedan, but from his own people no hand was stretched out to save him. Jews and Oriental Christians regard the matter with indifference. A mere handful of persons from the Western world, whose minds are full of anxieties and hopes for the redemption of Zion, are the only ones interested in this great problem. Divine Power is needed to turn back the current which is now strong against them.

A Sermon by T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, I. Timothy 5: 4. . . .

Let them learn first to show piety at home.

DURING the summer months the tendency is to the fields, to visitation, to foreign travel and the watering-places, and the ocean steamers are thronged; but in the winter it is rather to gather in domestic circles, and during these months we spend many of the hours within doors, and the apostle comes to us and says that we ought to exercise Christian behavior amid all such circumstances. Let them learn first to show piety at home.

There are a great many people longing for some grand sphere in which to serve God. They admire Luther at the Diet of Worms, and only wish that they had some such great opportunity in which to display their Christian prowess. They admire Paul making Felix tremble, and they only wish that they had some such grand occasion in which to preach righteousness, temperance and judgment to come. All they want is an opportunity to exhibit their Christian heroism. Now, the apostle practically says: "I will show you a place where you can exhibit all that is grand and beautiful and glorious in Christian character, and that is the domestic circle. Let them learn first to show piety at home." If one is not faithful in an insignificant sphere he will not be faithful in a resounding sphere.

There is one word in St. Paul's adjuration around which the most of our thoughts will revolve. That word is "home." Ask ten different men the meaning of that word, and they will give you ten different definitions. To one it means love at the hearth, plenty at the table, industry at the workstand, intelligence at the books, devotion at the altar. In that household, discord never sounds its war-whoop, and deception never tricks with its false face. To him it means a greeting at the door and a smile at the chair, peace hovering like wings, joy clapping its hands with laughter. Life is a tranquil lake. Pillowed on the ripples sleep the shadows. Ask another man what home is, and he will tell you it is want looking out of a cheerless fire-grate. The damp air shivering with curses. No Bible on the shelf. Children robbers and murderers in embryo. Obscene songs their lullaby. Every face a picture of ruin. Want in the background and sin staring from the front. No Sabbath-wave rolling over that door-sill. Vestibule of the pit. Shadow of infernal walls. Furnace for forging everlasting chains. Fagots for an unending funeral pile. Awful word. It is spelled with curses, it weeps with ruin, it chokes with woe, it sweats with the death-agony of despair. The word "home" in the one case means everything bright. The word "home" in the other case means everything terrific.

I shall speak now of home as a test of character, home as a refuge, home as a political safeguard, home as a school, and home as a type of heaven. And in the first place, home is a powerful test of character. The disposition in public may be in gay costume, while in private it is dishabille. As play-actors may appear in one way on the stage and may appear in another way behind the scenes, so private character may be very different from public character. Private character is often public character turned wrong side out. A man may receive you into his parlor as though he were a distillation of smiles, and yet his heart may be a swamp of nettles. There are business men who all day long are mild and courteous, and genial and good-natured in commercial life, damming back their irritability and their petulance and their discontent; but at nightfall the dam breaks, and scolding pours forth in floods and freshets. There is many a man who is affable in public life and amid commercial spheres, who, in a cowardly way, takes his anger and his petulance home and drops them in the domestic circle.

As at sunset sometimes the wind rises, so after a sunshiny day there may be a tempestuous night. There are people who in public act the philanthropist who at home act the Nero with respect to their slippers and their gown. Audubon, the great ornithologist, with gun and pencil went through the forests of America to bring down and to sketch the beautiful birds, and after years of toil and exposure completed his manuscript and put it in a trunk in Philadelphia, and went off for a few days of recreation and rest, and came back and found that the rats had utterly destroyed the manuscript; but without any discomposure and without any fret or bad temper he again picked up his gun and his pencil, and visited again all the great forests of America and reproduced his immortal work. And yet there are people with the ten thousandth part of that loss who are utterly irreconcilable; who, at the loss of a pencil or an article of raiment, will blow as long and loud and sharp as a northeast storm. Let us learn to show piety at home. If we have it not there, we have it not anywhere. If we have not genuine grace in the family circle, all our outward and public plausibility merely springs from the fear of the world, or from the slimy, putrid pool of our own selfishness. I tell you the home is a mighty test of character. What you are at home you are everywhere, whether you demonstrate it or not.

Again, home is a refuge. Yea, life is a stormy sea. With shivered masts and torn sails, and hulk aleak, we put in at the harbor of home. Blessed harbor! There we go for repairs in the drydock. The candle in the window is to the toiling man the lighthouse guiding him into port. Children go forth to meet their fathers as pilots at the Narrows take the hand of ships. The door-sill of the home is the wharf where heavy life is unladen. There is the place where we may talk of what we have done without being charged with self-adulation. There is the place where we may lounge without being thought ungraceful. There is the place where we may express affection without being thought silly. There is the place where we may forget our annoyances and exasperations and troubles. God pity the man or the woman who has no home!

Further, home is a political safeguard. The safety of the state must be built on the safety of the home. Why cannot France come to a placid republic? MacMahon appoints his Ministry and all France is aquake lest the republic be smothered. Gambetta dies, and there are hundreds of thousands of Frenchmen who are fearing the return of a monarchy. Faure dies and a revolution is dreaded. The Dreyfus case is at this moment a slumbering earthquake under Paris. France, as a nation, has not the right kind of a Christian home. The Christian hearthstone is the only hearthstone for a republic. The virtues cultured in the family circle are an absolute necessity for the state. If there be not enough moral principle to make the family adhere, there will not be enough political principle to make the state adhere. Jails and penitentiaries and armies and navies are not our best defence. The door of the home is the best fortress. The chimneys of our dwelling-houses are the grandest monuments to safety and triumph. No home, no republic!

Further, home is a school. Old ground must be turned up with subsoil plow, and it must be harrowed and re-harrowed, and then the crop will not be as large as that of the new ground with less culture. Now, youth and childhood are new ground, and all the influences thrown over their heart and life will come up in after-life luxuriantly. Every time you have given a smile of approbation—all the good cheer of your life will come up again in the geniality of your children. And every ebullition of anger, and every uncontrolable display of indignation, will be fuel to their disposition twenty or thirty or forty years from now—fuel for a bad fire a quarter of a century from this. You praise the intelligence of your child too much sometimes when you think he is not aware of it, and you will see the result of it before ten years of age in his annoying affectations. You praise his beauty, supposing he is not large enough to understand what you say, and you will find him standing on a high chair before a flattering mirror. Words and deeds and example are the seed of character, and children are very apt to be the second edition of their parents. What vast responsibility comes upon parents in view of this subject!

Oh, make your home the brightest place on earth if you would charm your children to the high path of virtue and rectitude and religion. Do not always turn the blinds the wrong way. Let the light, which puts gold on the gentian and spots the pansy, pour into your dwellings. Do not expect the little feet to keep step to a dead march. Get you no hint of cheerfulness from grasshopper's leap and lamb's frisk and quail's whistle, and garrulous streamlet which, from the rock at the mountain-top clear down to the meadow ferns under the shadow of the steep, comes looking to see where it can find the steepest place to leap off at, and talking just to hear itself talk? If all the skies hurtled with tempest and everlasting storm wandered over the sea, and every mountain stream were raving mad, frothing at the mouth with mud-foam, and there were nothing but simoons blowing among the hills, and there were neither lark's carol nor humming-bird's trill, nor waterfall's dash, but only bear's bark and panther's scream and wolf's howl, then you might well gather into your homes only the shadows. But when God has strewn the earth and the heavens with beauty and with gladness, let us take into our home circles all innocent hilarity, all brightness and all good cheer. A dark home makes bad boys and bad girls in preparation for bad men and bad women.

Above all, my friends, take into your homes Christian principle. Can it be that in any of the comfortable homes whose inmates I confront, the voice of prayer is never lifted? What! no supplication at night for protection? What! no thanksgiving in the morning for care? How, my brother, my sister, will you answer God in the day of judgment with reference to your children? Oh! parents, when you are dead and gone, and the moss is covering the inscription of the tombstone, will your children look back and think of father and mother at family prayer? Will they take the old family Bible and open it and see the mark of tears of contrition and tears of consoling promise wept by eyes long before gone out into darkness? Oh! if you do not inculcate Christian principle in the hearts of your children, and you do not warn them against evil, and you do not invite them to holiness and to God, and they wander off into dissipation and into infidelity, and at last make shipwreck of their immortal soul, on their deathbed and in the day of judgment they will curse you!

Seated by the register or the stove, what if, on the wall, should come out the history of your children! What a history—the mortal and immortal life of your loved ones! Every parent is writing the history of his child. He is writing it, composing it into a song, or pointing it with a groan.

My mind runs back to one of the best of early homes. Prayer, like a roof over it. Peace, like an atmosphere in it. Parents, personifications of faith in trial and comfort in darkness. The two pillars of that earthly home long crumbled to dust. But shall I ever forget that early home? Yes, when the flower forgets the sun that warmed it. Yes, when the mariner forgets the star that guided him. Yes, when love has gone out on the heart's altar, and memory has emptied its urn into forgetfulness. Then, the home of my childhood, I will forget thee. The family altar and a father's supplication, and a mother's tenderness, the voices of affection, the funeral of our dead, the father and mother with interlocked arms like entertwining branches of trees making a perpetual arbor of love and peace and kindness—then I will forget thee—then, and only then. You know, my brother, that a hundred times you have been kept out of sin by the memory of such a scene as I have described. You have often had raging temptations, but you know what has held you with supernatural grasp. I tell you a man who has had such a good home as that never gets over it, and a man who has had a bad early home never gets over it.

Again, home is a type of heaven. At our best estate we are only pilgrims and strangers here. "Heaven is our home." And how delightful it will be for brothers and sisters to meet after long separation. Once they parted at the door of the tomb; now they meet at the door of immortality. Where are now all their sins and sorrows and troubles? Overwhelmed in the Red Sea of death, while they pass through dryshod. Gates of pearl, capstones of amethyst, thrones of dominion do not stir my soul so much as the thought of home. Once there, let earthly sorrows howl like storms and roll like seas. Home! Let thrones rot and empires wither. Home! Let the world die in earthquake struggle and be buried amid procession of planets and dirge of spheres. Home! Let everlasting ages roll in irresistible sweep. Home! No sorrow. No crying. No tears. No death. But home, sweet home, beautiful home, everlasting home, home with each other, home with angels, home with God!

One night, lying on my lounge when very tired, my children all around about me, in full romp and hilarity and laughter—on the lounge, half awake and half asleep—I dreamed this dream: I was in a far country. It was not Persia, although more than Oriental luxuriance crowned the cities. It was not the tropics, although more than tropical fruitfulness filled the gardens. It was not Italy, although more than Italian softness filled the air. And I wandered around looking for thorns and nettles, but I found that none of them grew there; and I saw the sun rise, and I watched to see it set, but it sank not. And I saw the people in holiday attire, and I said, "When will they put off this and put on workmen's garb, and again delve in the mine, and swelter at the forge?" But they never put off the holiday attire.

And I wandered in the suburbs of the city to find the place where the dead sleep, and I looked all along the line of the beautiful hills, the place where the dead might most peacefully sleep, and I saw towers and castles, but not a mausoleum, or a monument, or a white slab could I see. And I went into the chapel of the great town, and I said, "Where do the poor worship? and where are the hard benches on which they sit?" and the answer was made me, "We have no poor in this country." And then I wandered out to find the hovels of the destitute, and I found mansions of amber and ivory and gold, but not a tear could I see, not a sigh could I hear. And I was bewildered, and I sat down under the branches of a great tree, and I said, "Where am I? and whence comes all this scene?" And then out from among the leaves and up the flowery paths and across the broad streams there came a beautiful group thronging all about me, and as I saw them come I thought I knew their step, and as they shouted I thought I knew their voices; but then they were so gloriously arrayed in apparel such as I had never before witnessed that I bowed as stranger to stranger. But when again they clapped their hands and shouted "Welcome, welcome," the mystery all vanished, and I found that time had gone and eternity had come, and we were all together again in our new home in heaven; and I looked around and I said, "Are we all here?" and the voices of many generations responded, "All here!" And while tears of gladness were running down our cheeks, and the branches of the Lebanon cedars were clapping their hands, and the towers of the great city were chiming their welcome, we all together began to leap and shout and sing, "Home! Home! Home!"

France Mourns....

....Her Dead President

retired. President Faure meanwhile was all unconscious of what was taking place. He continued in this condition for nearly an hour, and at ten minutes after ten o'clock P. M. he breathed his last.

Immediately after the physicians' announcement that life was indeed extinct, M. Dupuy, the Premier, communicated with the members of the Cabinet, the Presidents of the Senate and Chamber of Deputies and other high officials, formally announcing the death of M. Faure and requesting that the necessary steps be taken to inform the population of the calamity that has befallen France. Before eleven o'clock, the news had spread throughout Paris, and awe-stricken crowds had gathered in the neighborhood of the the Palace of the Elysee.

All night long they stayed, and at daybreak their numbers were augmented by thousands. Their grief was sincere, and it was evident that M. Faure, who had sprung from the people and was one of themselves, was genuinely beloved. At the palace, messages of condolence poured in from the rulers of European countries, and even from Asia. Our own government cabled an official expression of its sorrow at the intelligence of President Faure's death. Not only was he greatly liked by Americans abroad, but for the United States and its people he had always the kindliest and friendliest feeling, holding that there was an indissoluble kinship between the sister republics.

A striking illustration of the uncertainty of human life and the vanity of earthly pomp and splendor, became apparent at the palace on Friday morning, when workmen began to tear down the brilliant draperies and decorations which had been placed there in preparation for a grand state ball, which was announced to be held in the palace a week later. All the arrangements were under way for a great round of festivities, and six thousand invitations had been issued. Now, the gay tapestries are gone and sombre black has been hung in their place. The hall of festivities has become a house of death.

Although the attack to which President Faure succumbed came suddenly, and his death was a shock to France and Europe, it is learned that for some time he had been personally aware of the existence of some serious heart trouble. But he was a secret sufferer, and confided his apprehensions to very few. He had symptoms of arterial sclerosis (hardening or drying up of the tissues), and was under treatment for several months. Lately, he had become slightly lame, the consequence of a fall received long ago. The official certificate gave the cause of the fatal seizure as "congestion and hemorrhage of the brain." The attack was followed by paralysis of the left side, coma and death. It is considered probable that one of the main arteries of the brain had become obstructed by a blood-clot—a condition technically known as "thrombosis"—and found in the case of aged or debilitated persons.

France is now confronted by a peril which threatens the well-being, if not the existence of the republic. The plotting Bonapartists are watching their opportunity to strike a blow at the heart of the republic, as feverish wolves might watch for a sign of weakness on the part of their intended victim, before venturing an attack. Prince Victor Napoleon (now in Italy), and Prince Louis Napoleon (now in Russia in the Czar's service), are believed to be contemplating some stroke which will have the effect of restoring the monarchy. Their partisans are numerous and active, yet it is not likely that there would be much sympathy shown by the nation as a whole, with any attempt to overthrow the republic now. Such an attempt, would in all probability, result in widespread revolution and bloodshed. The most conservative leaders of public opinion, and the friends of the republic, are unfavorable to a change.

On the day following the death of President Faure, a large meeting of Senators was held, at which M. Emile Loubet, President of the Senate, was unanimously nominated for the Presidency of the Republic in succession to the late incumbent. M. Dupuy, who had been spoken of as a suitable candidate, declined to enter the contest against M. Loubet. The latter, though nominated by the Leftist Senators, was conceded to be a candidate upon whom in a grave political crisis, all parties might unite for the welfare of the republic. M. Meline was nominated by a meeting of the Progressist Republicans, but also withdrew in M. Loubet's favor, and, although he was again presented, there was little strength in his candidacy. On February 18, the National Assembly, or Congress, in which the Senators and Deputies unite in voting for a President of France, met at Versailles. A ballot was taken, resulting in 483 votes for M. Loubet and 279 for M. Meline. M. Loubet was thereupon declared elected President of the Republic.

M. EMILE LOUBET
The Newly Elected President

Emile Loubet was born on December 31, 1838, at Marsanne, France. He studied law, and settled in Montelimar, near his native village, and ultimately became Mayor of the town.

His political career began in 1876, when he was elected to the Chamber of Deputies. M. Loubet took his seat as a Moderate Republican. He was reelected in 1877 and 1881. In 1885 he was chosen to the Senate, and in the Tirard Cabinet, in 1887–1888 he held the portfolio of Public Works. On the fall of the Freycinet Ministry in 1892, President Carnot commissioned M. Loubet to form a Cabinet, which took office on February 20, 1892, and was overthrown on November 28 of the same year. He has never been personally involved in any of the scandals that have troubled French politics during his public career, although one of his ministries was overthrown on the Panama affair. He is what is known as a "colorless candidate," a conservative in his political opinions, and has thus far expressed no pronounced views on the Dreyfus case, either for or against revision, although the revisionists supported him in the election. It is believed he will make a safe, conscientious and successful Executive.

Felix Faure, the dead President, was the sixth Executive of the Republic. He was elected on January 17, 1895, to succeed M. Casimir Perier. He was born in Paris, January 30, 1841, educated at a private school and obtained a commercial training in England. His father was a cabinetmaker, and Felix after leaving school, was apprenticed to a currier. At twenty-three he married, and to the influence of his wife was largely due the success of his later career. He engaged successively in the business of a commission merchant and ship-owner. During the war with Germany, he served his country in the field. In 1874, he was chosen as Deputy-Mayor of Havre, by the Broglie Cabinet. He was a fluent speaker and an excellent lecturer, and through these qualifications came in contact with many philanthropist, mainly Protestants. M. Faure never made any open display of his religious preferences, and while regarded as a conforming Protestant, he was never baptized into that faith, nor is it known that he ever professed allegiance to Rome, although at the last moments of his life, a priest of that church was beside the unconscious ruler.

M. Faure made his debut in politics about eighteen years ago. In 1881, he was elected a Deputy from Havre, and soon after became under-Secretary of State for Commerce and Colonies, resigning in 1882, only to resume the same portfolio in 1883. He became influential, especially on colonial questions. After serving in the Chamber in 1885–86, he entered the Tirard Cabinet, in 1887, as Colonial Minister. He also served in the Dupuy Cabinet, and became Minister of Marine under President Perier. In 1895, he was elected President, and his administration was well regarded throughout the nation. He was largely instrumental in bringing about the alliance with Russia, which afforded so much gratification to the French people. Personally, he was a man of delightful manners, courtly in the extreme, a great lover of etiquette and fine society, and fond of mingling with royalties, yet keen and sagacious in the conduct of national affairs. No President has ever enjoyed a greater degree of popularity and none could be more deeply mourned. He leaves two daughters and a widow.

Rioting in Paris

Although the election of a new President by the National Assembly passed off quietly, the anti-Dreyfus element soon, thereafter began to make serious trouble in Paris. Rioting took piace in the streets during the days, immediately following the election. The police precautions were unavailing. Mobs paraded, shouting "Conspuez Loubet!" ("Spit upon Loubet!") "Vive l'arnee!" and "a bas les juifs!" ("down with the Jews!") The Loubet supporters were equally vociferous, and many fierce encounters occured. Doors and windows of newspaper offices were smashed. In one melee, over forty persons were injured, fourteen of them policemen. The situation is extremely ominous.

PRESIDENT FAURE IN HIS PRIVATE OFFICE

Women Against the Mormon

TWO representative deliberative conventions of women in Washington last week took formal action in opposition to the admission to a seat to the House of Representatives of the Mormon Congressman-elect, Brigham H. Roberts. On Feb. 18th, in the National Congress of Mothers, the following resolution, framed by Mrs. E. H. Parsons of Utah, was passed without a dissenting voice:

Whereas, The election of a polygamist to Congress threatens the sacred institution of monogamous marriage, be it resolved that the third triennial National Congress of Mothers requests the Congress of the United States to repudiate the result of the November election in Utah, either by refusing to allow Brigham H. Roberts, of Utah, to be placed on its roll or by expelling him from his seat.

The National Council of Women (in which there are several members who belong to the Mormon Church in Utah) adopted a resolution as follows:

Whereas, The National Council of Women of the United States stands for the highest ideals of domestic and civic virtue, as well as for the observance of law in all its departments, both State and national; therefore,

RESOLVED, That no person should be allowed to hold a place in any law-making body of this nation who is not a law-abiding citizen.

The resolutions of both bodies will be laid before the next U. S. Congress when it meets.

Thus the womanhood, wifehood and motherhood of the United States speaks with no uncertain voice in opposition to the outrage of admitting to the body of our law-makers a man who has defied our laws and whose recognized presence in Congress would be a most fearful blow to all that woman holds sacred—to all that centuries of civilization and Christian progress have won for her.

THE BLIND MAN HEALED

S. S. Lesson for March 12. John 9: 1-11
Golden Text, John 9: 25

BY MRS. M. BAXTER

AFTER a time of special contradiction and contact with opposing spirits such as Jesus had had, how many would think they needed at any rate a few hours to recover their equilibrium! But our beloved Lord never lost his equilibrium. Steadily and continually receiving everything as it arose from his Father; every incident of the day prepared for the next that should come. There was, therefore, no reaction. Suffering there was, intense suffering, but always received willingly, and consequently nothing went against the grain. Thus, when leaving the temple, under the stones thrown at him by the angry Jews, he was ready for the man born blind whom he saw as he passed by. How little the disciples understood their Lord and his teaching! While he was looking upon the poor man with a view to his healing, their thoughts found expression in the words: "Who sinned, this man or his parents, that he was born blind?" Neither did he sin nor his parents, but that the works of God might be seen in him.

"How did it happen? Whose fault is it?" Such are the questions commonly heard regarding any accident or misfortune. Human nature in its pride loves to fasten the blame somewhere, and to look down from its heights of imaginary superiority upon the supposed delinquent. Divine grace, whether in Christ or in them in whom he dwells, is not so much occupied in apportioning the blame as in remedying the evil. The presence of blindness is the reason why the works of God should be manifest in the blind. The presence of sin of whatsoever order, is the very reason why the work of the Saviour should be manifest in the sinner. When we stand on God's side, salvation and deliverance are our first thoughts. When we stand on the human side, it is the sin, the disease or the trouble, and how it came about, which engrosses us.

"We must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day: the night cometh when no man can work." "As long as I am in the world, I am the Light of the world." And, as the Light of the world, he proceeded to banish darkness from the blind.

Spitting on the ground, and making mud of the saliva, he anointed the eyes of the blind man and said, "Go, wash in the pool of Siloam." The blind man had not made request to be healed: but he had probably heard the words of Jesus and his disciples regarding him, and without entering into the question of where the responsibility of his blindness lay, or any way dealing with man, he simply obeyed the man who had spoken about the works of God being manifest in him. It was true wisdom, and he went in his darkness, but returned from Siloam seeing.

The healing of the impotent man at the pool of Bethesda had made a great sensation; and the scribes and Pharisees, themselves unable to work any such miracles, had sought to kill God's Christ. The healing of the blind man would also soon be known.

Then the neighbors, knowing the unpopularity of Jesus with the Pharisees, brought the man to them. Was it ordered of God that again it should be a Sabbath day when a miracle of healing took place? In answer to the questions of these authorities in religion the man repeated his story, and the Pharisees, without a word of cordial rejoicing with the healed man, at once condemned the great Healer. "This man is not of God because he keepeth not the Sabbath day." "How can a man that is a sinner do such miracles? said others. And there was a division among them."

In answer to a further question, the blind man said of Jesus, "He is a Prophet." The blind Pharisees could not see the Light of the world, but the same light from above which led the simple Samaritan woman to say to him, "Sir, I perceive that thou art a Prophet" (John 4: 19), now led the healed man to say of Jesus, "He is a Prophet." Those who come into personal contact with the Lord, whose hearts are changed or whose bodies are healed by him, cannot be deceived as to whose hand has touched them. But the Jews did not desire such a prophet, and so refused to believe what they could not explain without believing in Jesus. So, hoping to find some flaw in the statement of the man, they sent for his parents and put the question, "Is this your son, who ye say was born blind? How then doth he now see?" The parents were in a dilemma; they knew that if they confessed Jesus they would be put out of the synagogue. They would not run the risk of this, and so they prevaricated to save themselves the reproach: "We know that this is our son, and that he was born blind: but by what means he now seeth, we know not; or who hath opened his eyes we know not: he is of age: ask him: he shall speak for himself."

[illegible] were baffled; their attempts to throw discredit on the story had not succeeded; the miracle had taken place, and the hated Jesus was the doer of it. Sending again for the blind man they attempted to break his confidence in his great benefactor. "Give God the praise: we know that this man is a sinner." "Whether he be a sinner or no, I know not," was the rejoinder: "one thing I know, that whereas I was blind, now I see." Was there not in the heart of this healed man some sense of indignation, some intuition of the wicked jealousy which possessed these leaders of religion among the Jews? When called upon a third time to tell his story, he asked them, "Will ye also be his disciples?" This stirred their wrath: they taunted him with being Christ's disciple, and said, "We are Moses' disciples. We know God speaks by Moses. As for this fellow, we know not whom he is." "What," in effect he said, "you religious leaders know nothing of a man whose power with God has opened eyes! God does not hear sinners, but he does hear them that worship him and do his will." "Since the world began was it not heard that any man opened the eyes of one that was born blind? If this man were not of God, he could do nothing." This was too much for Christ's enemies: in their exasperation they said to the man, "Thou wast altogether born in sin, and dost thou teach us?" And they excommunicated him as though he had committed some terrible sin! Such are religious teachers who do not really know God.

To this day, those who are spiritually healed, "turned from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God" are spoken against. Those who are not born again, do not of course, know anything of divine realities, and they take for granted that all which is outside of their own experience is a delusion. If they see proof positive that one who was once the slave of passion, of vanity, of evil temper, etc., [illegible] place, they will try, like the Jews, to prove that that person never was a slave of any of these sins; never was born blind. But why should people be so anxious to disprove the power of God, and to rule him out of court in the things which happen around them, the facts of which they cannot deny?

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers

HOW important this miracle was, in John's opinion, we may infer from the space he devotes to it. He is still adhering to the principle on which he wrote his gospel, which was, not to describe all that Jesus said and did, but to select such incidents as would tend to produce faith in him. This miracle was adapted to that end, because it was made the subject of judicial investigation. It was not performed in private or before friendly observers only, but in public, and the evidence was given by the man's parents, who were reluctant witnesses, and before the judges, who were obviously prejudiced. So clear is the proof that everyone who believes that the record of John is true, must believe that a miracle was wrought. The whole story is full of interest, and teachers will do well to disregard the absurd limitation of the Committee and take in the whole chapter. The lessons to be drawn from the incident are suggested by the attitude of the various persons. There were the disciples, who speculated about the cause of the man's affliction and uncharitably presumed that it was a punishment for sin, either his own or his parents'. There was the man himself, who promptly obeyed a command that must have seemed to him futile, who held to his conviction, and would not allow anyone to befog him. Then there were the judges, whom this unlearned man convicted of insincerity. Lastly there was the conduct of Christ, who gives his view of suffering, relieves the sufferer, and, finding him in spiritual darkness, follows the gift of physical eyesight with spiritual light. Each character deserves careful attention.

THE POOL OF SILOAM AS IT NOW IS

[illegible] habit still to suppose that affliction is necessarily punishment. That it is the result of wrongdoing in some cases, is true, but it is cruel to assume that it is always so. Christ said that in this instance the affliction was sent as an opportunity for a miracle. It would be well [illegible] erty, or in trouble of any kind, we took the same view of it. Instead of assuming that the family must have been improvident, or vicious, [illegible] the evil on themselves, we shall [illegible] follow Christ's example, do what we can to relieve the trouble. We cannot work miracles, but there is generally some help that we can render. [illegible] we should not speculate as to the cause of the calamity, but do our duty [illegible] is, as Christ said, one of "the works of God." One of Douglass Jerrold's [illegible] beautiful creations is that [illegible] silently endures the scolding of his wife. He had been called from [illegible] bed in the middle of the night to bail a man out of prison. When he returns, the wife denounces him for risking their property to secure the release of some boon companion, who doubtless well deserved to be locked up. Finally, goaded by her talk, he tells her that it was her own brother that he had bailed out, and she bursts into tears of gratitude.

He anointed the eyes of the blind man. Why Jesus should have anointed the man's eyes with clay is not apparent. Various reasons are suggested, none of which are satis[illegible]. Christ may have wished to deal with the man on his plane and gradually to lead him to a higher one. He was the kind of man who could be so led. We can follow his steps. In the eleventh verse, his Healer is "a man that is called Jesus. In the seventeenth verse, the man declares that "He is a prophet." In the thirty-third verse, he is certain that his Healer is from God. In the thirty-eighth verse, he worships him. He at least after his healing, was under no delusion as to the uselessness of the clay. He said, "He hath opened my eyes." There was a persistent belief in former days, that if a person afflicted with scrofula could get a king to lay his hand on the sufferer's head, he would be cured. In the time of George III. of England, a scrofulous man begged the king to touch him and work this miraculous cure. At last, in pity for him, George placed his hand on the man's head, with the pithy ejaculation, "God give thee, my lad, better health and more sense.

[illegible] Here, as in some other miracles of healing, Christ required co-operation. The sufferer must do something to show his faith. This man must cross the city to the pool of Siloam and wash, and he did not get his sight till he had washed. It may have appeared to him a useless proceeding, but he did it, and he came, seeing. To the man afflicted with a propensity to evil, in our day, whether to lust, to gambling, or to drink, it often seems a useless thing to tell him to believe on Christ and he will be delivered. When he obeys and trusts himself wholly in Christ's hands, he is astonished to find that his desire for his sin disappears. "I do not know how it is," men have said again and again at the Bowery Mission, New York; "I do not know how it is, but my passion for it has been taken away. Formerly, it was impossible to pass the door of a saloon without going in. Now, I walk right by, without a struggle."

Porto Rico of To-Day

Mr. A. G. Robinson's Story of Last Year's Campaign in Porto Rico and His Experiences and Observations of the Island People

By per. Charles Scribner's Sons

MARKET PLACE AT PONCE

A BOOK of timely interest to every American citizen has been issued by Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons of New York under the title, "The Porto Rico of To-Day." It is from the pen of Albert Gardner Robinson, who accompanied one of the first detachments of the army of invasion to Porto Rico, and remained on the island until the raising of the Stars and Stripes over the city of San Juan on Oct. 18 signalled the triumph of our arms. Mr. Robinson had abundant opportunities of observation as a newspaper correspondent, and he used them to good purpose. His descriptions of the island, its roads, productions, industrial possibilities; and of the people, their manners and customs, their homes and idiosyncrasies, show that he is a trained observer, who can give a graphic verbal photograph of this interesting acquisition to American territory. Besides this, Mr. Robinson tells in vivid language the story of the campaign, and so contributes a valuable chapter to current history. By the courtesy of the publishers, we publish on this page a few of the pictures with which his book is embellished. The following extracts from Mr. Robinson's book will show its charming descriptive power:

In comparative figures, Porto Rico is less than half the size of the State of New Jersey. It would take about fourteen Porto Ricos to cover the State of New York. Three Rhode Islands would cover Porto Rico and leave enough margin for a foot-path around it. Less than a hundred miles will measure its length, and less than forty its width. We have but one or two States in the Union so densely populated as Porto Rico. Its average to the square mile exceeds that of Connecticut, New York, or New Jersey, and far exceeds that of Ohio or Illinois. It is not a wild, new country for commercial or speculative exploitation. Its settlement antedates that of America. San Juan had been established for more than fifty years when Menendez built his fort at St. Augustine, and had seen twenty different governors of the island before Virginia Dare was born.

Yet with all this comparative density of population, with all the richness of the soil of the island, with a people whose numbers are but a little less than those who make their homes in Brooklyn, the entire trade of the island, domestic and foreign, export and import, is less than that of many an American city with one-tenth of its number of inhabitants.

Ponce

Under ordinary circumstances I should set Ponce down as a disappointing place to visiting strangers, until they had made the acquaintance of some of those charming people who make the city their home. Its surroundings are undeniably attractive, but the stranger finds a dearth of entertainment in the city itself. The place claims a population of between twenty and thirty thousand in the city proper, with jurisdiction over a surrounding territory the inclusion of which leads to the occasional publication of figures ranging from forty to forty-five thousand of the population of the city of Ponce.

The market is doubtless fully up to the requirements of the place, but it was far behind that of Mayaguez, though the latter is a less populous city. Doubtless also the local way of getting supplies for the table is wholly satisfactory to the people, but it was lacking in many features which Americans find convenient and desirable. The market opens at some unearthly hour in the morning. I never spent a night there to note the hour at which the first arrival put in his appearance. I did stop there one morning on my way to San Juan, to get a cup of coffee. It was four o'clock and pitch dark, but the coffee was there, hot and strong. So were at least fifty or seventy-five people. I could not see how many might be out in the darkness beyond, but there were those in the immediate vicinity of the coffee-stands. All the way along the road, for the first ten miles of our journey that morning, we met the people coming in with their little stock of garden products to be exposed for sale. How early the buyers turn out I do not know, but the sellers are certainly of the "early bird" variety.

A brief acquaintance with the Ponce market would lead the average observer to a conclusion that it was a poor man's institution. The same will hold true of all the city markets of Porto Rico. One rarely sees a well-dressed buyer. All seem to be of the poorer classes, and the smallness of their purchases seems to indicate a necessity for economy. Many of them, however, are the servants of the people of the better class, doing the daily marketing for the family by which they are employed. One of the noticeable features of all these island cities and towns is the absence from the streets and stores of ladies whose apparel and demeanor would indicate them as of well-to-do families. Their absence arises from the fact that it is generally regarded as a proceeding of doubtful respectability for a lady to go about the streets, unless accompanied by a duenna or by some male member of the family. These are not always available, and the processes of marketing and shopping are commonly carried on through servants or by means of messengers from the stores.

One also misses certain kinds of American stores, notably those connected with food supplies. The markets close at noon. All purchases of meats, vegetables and fruits are supposed to be, and must be, made before that hour. I did not learn the resources for supplies in the case of the arrival of unexpected guests, whose presence would necessitate a more extensive provision than that made for the family. One could not send around the corner, or a few blocks down the street, and get a roast, or a chop, or a fowl, a fish, or a steak, at any time when it might be wanted. There was no convenient provision store, or green-grocer, from which one could obtain a bit of lettuce or a bunch of celery. There was no convenient fruit-store. Here and there, in some out-of-the-way corner one might find a little shop where some kinds of fruit, and possibly a few vegetables, might be obtained; but the stock of such places was not particularly tempting. One missed also the American grocery-store, with its cleanly kept assortment of attractive foods. To market or to shop in these places one must go through a process of special education, to learn just where to go for the things wanted. No doubt Porto Rican ways are just as good as American ways, when one becomes accustomed to them; but at first one is struck by the seeming incongruity of finding hardware and saddlery in a dry-goods store; of buying potatoes and cigarettes in a place which gives all evidence of being devoted to the sale of delicatessen, and of buying bread and native rum over the same counter. The adjustment of lines of merchandise in Porto Rico savors, in many cases, of the back-country districts of Maine and North Carolina.

HOME OF THE PEONS

A good knowledge of the Spanish language is of course a desirability in any Spanish or Spanish-American country. But it is not a necessity. There may be times when one has to sacrifice a bit of dignity in order to get what is wanted, but most of us have enough of that to be able to spare a little of it.

A STREET IN PONCE

CITY HALL OF SAN JUAN

The People

The common people of the island are a mixture of all shades of color, from full black to yellow, with here and there a paler tint. Comfort and economy appear to be the chief ends to be served in the matter of wearing apparel. Neither style nor cleanliness seems to be of any consideration with the masses. Many men and women are barefooted, and many a dusky-skinned toddler of four or five years and under is wholly free from any fear of soiling his or her pinafore, by reason of being wholly free from the pinafore—or anything else. Masculine apparel usually consists of a battered hat, a cotton shirt, cotton trousers, and shoes—sometimes. Feminine apparel is a matter for feminine description and feminine ears. I only know that, among the class to which I am now referring, the feminine portion looks very baggy, very slouchy, and usually very dirty. Men, women and children appear to occupy the bulk of their time eating mangoes, that fruit which Lady Brassey so aptly describes by pronouncing it a most delicious fruit, but to be eaten only in one's bath-tub.

When not busy eating mangoes, scores of these people parade the streets in search of wealth. The street-peddler is quite a feature in the cities of the island, but their number and their activity was vastly augmented by the influx of so large a number of possible customers. They peddled mangoes, cocoa-nuts and other fruits, and pastes.

Earnest Work

WE must get more fire of zeal if we are going to do much toward bringing this world to God. We need an earnestness that amounts to holy recklessness. A brother comes into a prayer-meeting and he stands up to speak a word for Christ! How tremulous he is! He says: "I wonder if the people will hear me?" His heart is not enlisted. He wonders who will criticize him; he wonders if such and such a person is present. Before he begins to speak for Christ he looks all around to be sure such an one is not in the room. How he trembles! After a while he gets through, and he wonders whether he made any mistakes, and he goes away asking his friend: "How did I do to-night? Did I get along well, or did I make a balk?" He is not in earnest. There is another young man beside him. What does he care for prayer-meeting rhetoric! He says: "Here are people that I must meet before the throne of God, and I have but three minutes now to talk to them. I don't care what people say. It is between God and my soul and their souls." A Sabbath School teacher sits down before her class. She is not in earnest; she has no appreciation of the great work to which she is called. She thinks that it is a fine thing to be a Sabbath School teacher. She comes in and says to the class: "Fine day!" Then she arranges her apparel; then she gives an extra twist to the curl and looks at the apparel of all the children in the class. A minister of the Gospel comes on the Sabbath day into the ante-room of the church. He is not in earnest. He has just happened to get into the ministry. He says: "I wonder what the newspapers will say of to-day? I wonder how many critics there will be in the church? I wonder if that sharp-looking man that sat before me last Sabbath, looking at me through those spectacles, will be there to-day? I wonder if my hair is parted straight? I wonder how my cravat is tied? I wonder if my shoes have the right polish? I wonder if that gesture I made a while ago is graceful? The Sabbath goes by, the people disperse to their homes; no saving impression is made; the Sabbath is dead and will not live again until the resurrection. Another man of God comes to the ante room of the church: He says: "Now there will be hundreds of people here this morning. What shall I say to them? I may be dead before next Sabbath. There may be people in church to-day who will never be there again. It is my last chance at them. O God, help me now; if thou never didst help me before, help me to-day!" And then he comes before the people and looks upon the audience and says: "All these, in fifty or seventy years, will be gone. They will have heard their last offer of mercy and salvation. The trumpet of judgment will sound and they will stand before the throne, and I will be there, too." Oh, how different then the preacher feels! How little he cares for what the world says of him! How his soul goes up to God in agony of earnestness! How little he cares for the gesture, the style of his apparel, or what the critics may say! It is a matter between himself, his God and his hearers.

Legislative Integrity!

WE are hearing so much about legislative corruption, official incompetence, bosses, rings, etc., that the exclamation point really seemed necessary after our caption, to show that we have not mis-written the word. After all, these matters are very much as you look at them. A man—two, three men—are detected giving or receiving bribes, or who are guilty of some criminal malfeasance, and immediately a hue and cry is raised, and their names are telegraphed from coast to coast as synonyms of disgrace. We do not object to the punishment of the guilty, but we do declare that it is grossly unjust that they should be considered as typical of their different assemblies. There are in these United States more than two score legislatures, aggregating several thousand men, and are we to condemn the whole lot because of a few black sheep? Because New York has a conscienceless boss, or Pennsylvania an unprincipled trickster, or California a contemptible briber, is it fair to denounce all legislators as rascals who have forfeited all claims to social respect and political preferment and who should be handed over to perdition?

Whatever impression current reports may give, all Americans in official life are not corruptionists and scoundrels. All genuine American statesmen are not yet dead. There are yet many in whom disinterested devotion to the commonweal still plays a large part. And to their quiet perseverance, to their obscure integrity, notwithstanding the obloquy and scorn some of their reckless compeers bring upon them, are we to attribute the fact that a vast amount of really beneficial legislation is enacted, and that the progress of the state is encouraged and guaranteed by legal securities. Let these just men have their meed of praise. Let them receive the appreciative esteem of their fellow-citizens. Let them be singled out for promotion. Thus, in time, the reputation of our legislatures may be redeemed; their halls be crowded with generous, aspiring souls, who through a laudable service to their state, may pass on to direct and adorn the higher councils of the nation.

Highest Education

MUCH emphasis is being placed on the importance of intellectual culture. But the more education people have, if it be not accompanied by moral culture, the worse for the world. Robespierre, and Rousseau, and Byron, were illustrations of men with splendid intellect but no moral culture. Better for them they had lived on the very lowest round of ignorance than they should have risen by their mental qualifications, and cursed the world with their cruelties and nastiness. I tell you we want something more than geographies, and grammars, and vulgar fractions, to prepare our youth for good citizenship. The great curse of the land to-day is the educated villain. Men of this style know enough; they know everything; they know too much. But they have no moral restraints. Intelligence without some kind of moral principle is a plague. There is nothing more wonderful than a locomotive. There it stands—axle, piston-rods, cranks, cylinders, driving-wheel, throttle-valve. You let the steam on. The machine starts. After it gets under full headway, the engineer jumps off. Now that useful machine becomes an instrument of destruction, crashing death through the villages. There is nothing more beautiful than the human intellect when all its faculties are in full play. How attractive and how mighty! But if there be no moral principle to guide, control, and engineer it, then it works one long line of ruin and desolation through all the communities where it marches. Ignorance is bad but intelligence is worse if immoral. There is hardly anybody who makes a speech who does not refer to the wonderful things in Greece and Rome. Well, they had great philosophers, and great poets, and orators; but how about their morals? Why is it that when a man is traveling in Italy to-day with his family, he is stopped at the door of the museum by the janitor, who tells him: "You may come in, sir, but not your family?" It is because the sculpture and the painting of those boasted times were abhorrent to all decency, and learned Greece and Rome, and splendid Corinth, and magnificent Pompeii, were worse than the "Five Points" in their worst days. It is not what you know; it is what you are.

The Church Door-Keeper

HOW many a sermon has been ruined, and how many an audience has been stupefied by a poorly ventilated church. It is almost as important that a congregation have a competent sexton as to have a competent minister. King David, it is evident, once thought of becoming a church sexton, for he said, "I had rather be a door-keeper," and so on; but he never carried out the plan, perhaps because he had not the qualification. What a prize is the good sexton. He is the minister's blessing, the church's joy, a harbinger of the millennium. People come to church to have him help them up the aisle. He wears slippers. He stands or sits at the end of the church during an impressive discourse, and feels that, though he did not furnish the ideas, he at least furnished the wind necessary in preaching it. He has a quick nostril to detect unconsecrated odors, and puts the man who eats garlic on the back seat in the corner. He does not regulate the heat by a broken thermometer, minus the mercury. He has the window-blinds arranged just right—the light not too glaring, so as to show the freckles, nor too dark, so as to cast gloom—but a subdued light makes the plainest face attractive. He rings the bell merrily for Christmas festival, and tolls it sadly for the departed. He has real pity for the bereaved in whose house he goes for the purpose of burying their dead—not giving by cold, professional manner the impression that his sympathy for the troubled is overpowered by the joy he has in selling another coffin. He forgets not his own soul; and though his place is to stand at the door of the ark, it is surely inside of it. After a while, a Sabbath comes when everything is wrong in church; the air is impure, the furnaces fail in their work, and the eyes of the people are blinded with an unpleasant glare. Everybody asks, "Where is our old sexton?" Alas! he will never come again. He has gone to join Obed-edom and Berechiah, the door-keepers of the ancient ark. He will never again take the dusting-whisk from the closet under the church stairs, for it is now with him, "Dust to dust." The bell he so often rang takes up its saddest tolling for him who used to pull it, and the minister goes into his disordered and unswept pulpit, and finds the Bible upside down as he takes it up to read his text in Psalms, eighty-fourth chapter and tenth verse: "I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God than to dwell in the tents of wickedness."

BRIEF NOTES

There is now a Christian Endeavor Society both in Havana and Manila.

The number of Chinese Temples in the United States is now reported to be forty-seven.

An official of the prison of Sainte Pelagie in France states that of 2,455 under sentence in the Department of the Seine, 2,124 were drunkards.

There are twenty-five Baptist Churches in France. They have just organized a national union, with Pasteur Saillens, of Paris, as President.

Dr. Henry M. Field has retired from the editorial chair of the Evangelist which he has occupied with conspicuous ability for more than forty-four years.

The officers of a hospital in London in which 7,716 patients were treated last year, 1,175 of whom were in-patients, state that in only five cases was it necessary to prescribe alcoholic stimulants.

Rev. F. B. Meyer, the well-known evangelist and the successor of Dr. Newman Hall as pastor of Christ Church, London, is making a tour in India and is making addresses directed specially to quickening the spiritual life of Christians.

President McKinley recently sent the following telegram to Rev. F. E. Clark, President of the Christian Endeavor Society: "You have my hearty congratulations and best wishes for the great organization over which you preside."

The statement of the Papal income known as Peter's Pence, which is derived from the contributions of Roman Catholics all over the world, shows that the amount received from citizens of the United States was larger than that from any other country.

Rev. E. Payson Hammond has been holding meetings at Omaha, Neb. The editor of one of the daily journals which reports the meetings says that his father was converted many years ago at one of Mr. Hammond's meetings and was to the end of his life a consistent Christian.

An interesting character called "Dad" is the Bishop of St. Helena, who died recently. First he was a soldier, then a clergyman in Canada, a rector in England, a missionary and Archdeacon in South Africa, and finally Bishop of St. Helena. He met his death in a carriage accident.

An interesting work of grace has been in progress for some time at Ray, Ind. C. M. Smith, aided by his father, Dr. J. C. Smith, of Cincinnati, O., began a series of meetings which have been blessed to the conversion of a large number of persons, including many scholars in the Sunday School.

The French novelist, Zola, who was practically an infidel, is reported as declaring his conviction that his principles are disastrous to the community. He says he sees the French people, in falling away from religion, have sunk into animalism, and he is convinced that the only hope for the regeneration of France is a revival of Christianity.

It is proposed to extend the Federation of churches and Christian workers which has been in operation in New York, so as to have a natural organization similar to the one in operation in England. A commitee has been organized for the purpose, comprising representatives of the Baptist, Congregational, Disciples, Methodist and Presbyterian churches.

The African Methodist Episcopal Church, according to a statement published by Bishop B. W. Arnett, to the Independent, has now a total force of 633,849, including 9 bishops, 9 general officers, 4,825 ministers on the annual conference roll, 242 presiding elders (of whom 20 are in foreign countries), 8,409 local preachers, 5,250 exhorters and 614,125 church members, including probationers. There are 5,172 churches.

Mr. William Phillips Hall, the noted lay preacher who is widely, though incorrectly, known as the millionaire evangelist, is holding meetings, in connection with Mr. W. S. Weeden the Gospel singer, in the Marcy Avenue Baptist Church, Brooklyn. Their recent services in the Baptist Temple, Brooklyn, were remarkably successful. Nearly three hundred persons made public profession of Christ as a result of this campaign.

Dr. F. E. Clark, President of the Christian Endeavor Society, asks us to correct a statement, widely circulated by the secular press, to the effect that the Society had given an expression of opinion on the subject of Imperialism. Dr. Clark says that there has been no attempt to put the Society on record on the subject, and that in his remarks, he pleaded simply for just and generous treatment of all races who are within our sphere of influence, and that we should remember in all our dealings that righteousness alone "exalteth a nation."

Pictures from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are used as wedding presents in the interior of Africa. In a letter recently received from Mrs. Currie, who with her husband is living at Cisamba, the statement is made that the pictures are highly valued for this purpose, and that the powerful chief Kanjundu, who has come under Mr. Currie's influence, has a number of the frontispieces on the walls of his chief residence. He understands them and takes a pleasure in explaining them to his visitors and attendants.

A brief life of Christ for circulation among Polish, Galatian, and Russian Jews, has been prepared by Hananias Berliner, a converted Jew, born in Galicia. Its title is Ha-podeh-umassil, which means, "The Redeemer and Saviour." The author believes that the obstacle in the way of the conversion of his brother in Persia and Asia Minor is that he has taken his view of Christianity from the treatment he has received from Gentile Christians. He believes that large numbers might be won by learning what Christ really is.

Tolstoi's Plea for Peace

ONE of the most significant items of news brought by the cable in recent times is that the Czar of Russia, traveling in the neighborhood of Count Tolstoi's home, at Yassnaia-Poliana, sought an interview with the famous writer, and asked from him an expression of his views about the Disarmanent Conference. The Czar's object in suggesting the Conference and inviting the Powers of Europe and the United States to take part in it, is so thoroughly in line with Tolstoi's philosophy, that it was only natural that Tolsoi should wish it godspeed. He has labored for many years to spread abroad the doctrines of peace and Christian brotherhood, and has incurred a great deal of odium among the aristocracy of Russia, to which he belongs by birth, by his advocacy of these doctrines. Still more unpopularity has been incurred by his putting in practice on his ancestral estates, his theories of social reform, which, he contends, are based on the Sermon on the Mount. That this man, whose principles are so antagonistic to Russian ideas, and who has more than once been in danger of feeling the heavy hand of the Government laid upon him, should be invited to a special audience with the supreme ruler of that mighty empire, was a surprise to all who heard of it. Occurring as it did, soon after the Russian censor had forbidden the Russian journals even to mention the celebration of Tolstoi's seventieth birthday, in which all intellectual Russia participated, it was all the more remarkable, as showing that the Emperor, with all his power, is not able to impress his will on the officials of his own government. Tolstoi was evidently aware of this fact, and, while congratulating his sovereign on the purity and sincerity of his purposes, had evidently no faith in the success of the Conference. He has now published a letter in which his opinion is expressed unequivocally. In this letter he contends that the only true way to bring about universal peace is, for the men of all countries to refuse to enter the army, or to take up arms in any cause. "Indeed," he says: "if the people of our days go to war or even enter military service, giving themselves over to slavery to men whom they do not esteem, it is only because such persons are living in a state of terrible moral ignorance." Governments could not go to war, if the people would not fight. That, he believes, would be a more effectual way of preventing war than the Conference can devise. But in the present condition of the people, such a common resolve can never be induced. Not until Christ himself comes to rule in person as the Prince of Peace, will the prediction of the prophet be fulfilled:

Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more (Isa. 2 4).

Missing a Fortune

A dispatch from Lawrence, Mass., to the New York daily journals, reports the inheritance by a girl who works in a mill of a fortune of twenty thousand dollars. Sometime ago a citizen of that town, who had prospered in business, was looking around for an heir to his property. He had relatives in New Jersey, from among whom he proposed to select one to whom he would bequeath it. But, in order to test them, he disguised himself as a poor man and visited them to see if they would show him kindness. They all treated him coldly, and were glad when he left them and returned to his home. Now they learn that he has left his fortune to his niece, who is working in a mill. It may be presumed that she did show the old man the affection for which he was looking. His New Jersey relatives doubtless bitterly regret their treatment of him. They might have been spared their mortification if they had obeyed the injunction of the Apostle and welcomed their relative.

"Be not forgetful to entertain strangers: for thereby some have entertained angels unawares (Heb. 13 2)

In Peril on the Ice

A narrow escape from death in icy waters is described by a writer in Frank Leslie's Popular Monthly. It was at Shelter Island, N. Y., that a number of ice yachts were running before the wind. In one of them was a young girl who seemed to be enjoying the rapid motion. But suddenly she became alarmed. In trying to throw the sail loose it fouled the tiller, and her fingers being cold and stiff, she could not release it. The boat with its large sail filled was carried on rapidly toward the end of the ice. The occupants of other yachts saw the situation and gave chase, but only one attained anything like the speed of the runaway. This one gained upon it, but it seemed impossible to overtake it before it reached the line where the tide water was eating away the edge of the ice. At last, for one brief minute the yachts were side by side, and the strong arms of the man in the pursuing yacht were outstretched. The girl was seized and lifted in. Quick as thought, her rescuer eased his own sheet, and the boat spun round almost within its own length. So near had the rescue been made that the ice cracked under its runners as the boat sped to safety, and as they looked back they saw the yacht, on which the girl had been, plunge over the edge into the icy water. It was a narrow escape. In the spiritual affairs of life, it is not always possible to rescue those who are on their way to destruction and who, realizing their danger, are unable to stop, or to change their course. But to all such, even to those beyond human help, Christ offers his almighty power, if they will only call upon him.

Then he is gracious unto him and saith, Deliver him from going down to the pit; I have found a ransom (Job 33: 24).

Exile on a Dreary Island

A story of privation and misery has reached New York from the captain of a bark which sailed from this port for Australia last summer. He says that he and his crew of eleven men have been five months on the desolate island of Tristan d'Acunha, in the South Atlantic. During a severe storm the bark sprang a leak, and the captain and crew had time only to get on board the one boat the bark carried, before she foundered. After several days exposure, they landed on a rocky coast which proved to be the island of Tristan d'Acunha. The entire population consisted of seventy-two persons, who were living in extreme poverty. No vessels touched at the island, but the people had one boat, which was common property, in which they sent out to passing ships and obtained such supplies as the crews would give. They live in low houses of one room, which serves the family for all purposes. Their clothing is ragged and most of it is the gift of sailors in the ships they visit. Their staple diet is flesh and eggs of eaglets and penguins, which were so strong that the castaways could eat them only under the pressure of hunger. Several times during their stay, ships came in sight and the sailors would go out to meet them and beg to be taken on board, but could not be accommodated. At last the British cruiser, Thrush, was sighted, which received them and carried them to Capetown. It was only the sailors who knew of a better life who were so anxious to get away. The inhabitants of the island were content to stay in their misery, though doubtless the sailors told them how much happier they might be in some other land. They were like the people who turn a deaf ear to the preachers who tell them of heaven and how to get there. Though the sailors could speak from experience, while the preacher's message is based on faith, their story had no better effect. Perhaps if the preacher, too, could speak from experience his message would fail, as it now often does. Christ intimated that it would.

RESIDENCE OF TOLSTOI AT YASSANIA-POLIANA

COUNT LEO TOLSTOI, RUSSIA'S "GRAND OLD MAN"

If they hear not Moses and the prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead (Luke 16 31).

A Novel Tomb

A dispatch from Amesbury, Mass., describes a remarkable funeral which took place there recently. It was that of an eccentric old gentleman who had been in business in Buffalo, N. Y., but had retired and settled at Amesbury about thirty years ago. He had no relatives in the town, and lived a lonely kind of life. Last fall he bought a burial plot on the summit of a hill in Prospect Cemetery. He commenced the erection forthwith of a miniature mausoleum. The walls were of brick and cement and were a foot thick. The exterior was cased in marble. The interior was eight feet square and six feet high. The only thing within was a reclining chair of iron, facing the grated door. The mausoleum was finished to the owner's satisfaction and he visited it occasionally. When he died it was found that he had left elaborate directions as to his funeral. He ordered that his body be carried to the vault and placed in a sitting position in the chair prepared for it, facing the door. The door was then to be securely locked and the key destroyed. His directions were carried out exactly, and the body now reposes in the room designed for its reception. It may be hoped that he had as much foresight as to the place to which his soul would go, which was much more important, because that would be conscious of its surroundings while the body would not.

We are confident, I say, and willing rather to be absent from the body and to be present with the Lord (II. Cor. 5: 8).

Twelve Years Lost

A successful operation was performed recently by a Chicago surgeon, on an insane patient, who has been confined for several years in the Eastern Illinois Asylum for the Insane. The officials in that institution had taken a deep interest in his case and had formed the opinion, from several indications, that it was curable. But the boy did not recover, nor seem to be benefited by treatment. They learned that his insanity commenced twelve years ago, when he was a small boy at school. One of his playmates threw a brick at him, which struck him on the side of the head. He fell to the ground senseless, and when he recovered consciousness he was insane. This history of the case confirmed the asylum doctor's belief that he could be cured. The Roentgen rays were used, and disclosed the fact that the skull in one place had thickened, and was pressing on the brain. An operation was then performed and the boy was put to bed. In a few hours he awoke and, as the doctors had hoped, he was perfectly rational. His first words were: "Why did you hit me?" showing that the twelve years which had elapsed since the blow was struck, were a blank to him. The mind took up the thread of consciousness precisely at the point where it had ceased its normal functions. The incident deserves the attention of people who deny the immortality of the soul. It shows that close as is the connection between the mental and physical life, there must be a degree of independence in them, otherwise, as in this case, the physical life would not have gone on while the mental life was suspended. It shows, too, the tenacity of the mental life, which could thus resume its operations after they had been arrested for so long a period as twelve years. As the mind had survived the injury to the body, it is not hard to believe that it may survive the death of the body.

Why should it be thought a thing incredible with you that God should raise the dead (Acts 26: 8)?

Scenes in New York, During the Great Blizzard of Feb. 12th and 13th

(PHOTOGRAPHED SPECIALLY FOR "THE CHRISTIAN HERALD")

A TWENTY-THIRD STREET CROSSING

IT is now generally conceded that the great snow-storm which visited a large part of the American continent between February 11th and 13th, was the severest that has ever been experienced here within the memory of any one now living. That it outrivalled even the blizzard of 1888, in duration and severity, the Weather Bureau records show. It came after a week of zero weather, during which East and West alike suffered from the intense cold, and even the Southern and Gulf States were not exempt from penetrating boreal blasts. Hardly had the warning been sounded by the Signal Bureau, when the snow-freighted hurricane swept across the country from West to East, completely covering the ice-bound rivers and frozen mountains with a garment of white, and burying cities, towns and villages beneath an almost unprecedented snowfall. Gradually increasing in force, the storm at its maximum period was one of such tremendous violence that prolonged exposure would have meant death to either man or beast. Great snow-drifts piled up everywhere. The blizzard swept along in horizontal lines, and the air was full of minute flying icicles, blinding all who attempted to face the tempest. City streets were quickly deserted and business and travel suspended. In the country, people very wisely kept to their homes. On almost every railroad leading out of New York, the snowfall was so deep that scores of trains were blockaded, and travel on nearly all the lines was practically brought to a standstill. Ferries were run only at long intervals or not at all. Electric light plants were rendered useless and gas mains were choked by the accumulation of frozen moisture. Whole cities were in partial darkness. Seemingly, nature at a single blow, had obliterated nearly all the comforts and the conveniences which human ingenuity had devised in a century, for trolley, rail, steam, gas and electric light all went down, for a time at least, under the crushing and overwhelming force of the elements.

Our photographer has presented in the illustrations on these two pages some of the scenes witnessed in the metropolis during the blizzard, but it need hardly be explained that photography was impracticable during the height of the storm, when the wind and blinding drift were sweeping along at tornado speed. The loss to trade, both wholesalers and retailers, by such a storm must be estimated in the millions.

Columns might be filled with accounts of the discomforts and sufferings entailed by the blizzard upon dwellers in town and country. To the very poor it was indeed a visitation of terror. Insufficiently clad and ill-supplied with food and fuel, they shivered and sickened in their wretched homes. The hospitals were soon filled to overflowing. Kindly people found a thousand opportunities to relieve keen suffering on every hand, and, remembering the perils of the great storm eleven years ago, a vigilant watch was kept by many for the purpose of coming to the rescue of any wayfarer who might be overcome by exposure in the streets and who, lacking timely help might perish.

For travelers by boat or rail the blizzard had special terrors. Trains were stalled in immense snowdrifts, and on some lines in the Eastern and Middle States the passengers on such trains passed from six to twelve hours in total darkness, fires and car-lights having been extinguished. Fortunately, there were no fatal consequences from such experiences so far as reported. Incoming steamers, after voyages of great hardship, entered port looking like huge icebergs, hull, deckgear and rigging all glittering in a thick icy mail.

When the great storm finally passed over and the sun once more shone out on the snow-clad earth, people everywhere breathed easier, and the feeling of thankfulness for the relief was general. In a special bulletin, the Weather Bureau described its flight:

The great Atlantic coast storm passed on to the Nova Scotia coast with a rapid velocity and almost unprecedented development. Owing to its extent and extreme destructiveness, this storm will always be remembered as the greatest storm in the history of the Atlantic coast States, and was most remarkable for the perfect combination of the conditions necessary to produce such results. While the immense loss of property is to be greatly deplored, it is gratifying to learn that as much as possible was saved by the timeliness of the warning. Nearly all the temperature records were broken in the Gulf and South Atlantic States. The temperature at New Orleans [illegible] lowest that was previously known in Virginia, 12 below zero, 4° below the record; at Jacksonville, 10°, or 4° below the record, which [illegible] Carolina. From Virginia northward the amount ranged from ten to thirty inches, but was not well distributed. The greatest fall, twenty-seven inches, was reported from northern Virginia. At Washington, the fall was eleven inches, or a total of thirty-five inches during eight days.

With the subsidence of the storm, began the work of lifting the railroad blockade and cleaning the streets. Five thousand men were set to work by the Street Cleaning Department of New York sweeping up the snow and shoveling it into 2,500 carts, which in turn dumped it into the river. The immense piles of snow melting under the rising temperature made the thoroughfares veritable pools of slush. A full week after the abatement of the blizzard, the army of street cleaners was still energetically engaged in the most formidable task they had ever undertaken.

THE LAST OF ITS KIND

CLEARING BROADWAY—THE STREET-CLEANING BRIGADE AT WORK

Reports of serious losses of life and property poured in from every direction immediately after the storm. Florida, Georgia, Louisiana, North Carolina, Maryland, New Jersey, Maine, Massachusetts, New York, Connecticut, Rhode Island all suffered heavily. Death and disaster were present in many forms. Crops were ruined in many localities in the South. Supplies of food and fuel could not be moved during the blockade, and the result was a temporary rise almost to the famine point in food prices in the cities. Fortunately these difficulties were soon relieved by the advent of milder weather, and normal conditions were gradually restored. Many months must elapse, however, before those localities that suffered the most heavily can recover from the efects of the visitation of the great blizzard of 1899.

An interesting comparison of the blizzards of 1888

THE CENTRAL PARK ZOO IN WINTER

and 1899 is presented in the following article, which we reproduce from the New York Herald:

"In temperature, the blizzard of 1888 that held the city prisoner might be termed mild compared with the bitter storm that made all New York shiver and froze up much of its commerce. The blizzard of 1899 had a tendency to hang about the zero mark which the 1888 blizzard did not manifest.

"The storm of more than a decade ago was memorable chiefly because of the manner in which it blocked the streets and tied up traffic. It was 'long' on snow, while the storm of 1899 is most distinguished for its frigidity. The total snowfall of the 1888 blizzard was

AMID MOUNTAINS OF SNOW, 4TH AVE., N. Y.

20.9 inches. Most of the snow fell in one day, on March 12, when the fall was 16.5 inches. The lowest temperature during the three days of the 1888 blizzard was 4.8 degrees.

"The mercury during the 1899 storm dropped below zero with freedom and frequency. Six degrees below was a common occurrence."

One of the peculiar results of the great storm was that in many places it was followed by a water famine, the reservoirs in small towns and villages having been emptied by the constant flow of water which householders kept running to prevent pipes from freezing, during the long spell of zero weather.

One of the lessons of the great storm is the urgent need of abundant and improved street cleaning appliances in all our great cities. Even in New York, where over a million dollars a year are expended on keeping the streets clean, the old-fashioned big sweeping machine, drawn by horses, is still employed. Old-style wooden ploughs, too, of the same pattern as might have been seen in Colonial days, are also used. The snow-melting machine is of limited application. With all the wonderful progress made in different lines of mechanical science, and with electricity at hand to serve man in many ways hitherto unknown, it is a matter of surprise that nothing has yet been devised for clearing streets and sidewalks of snow.

Our cities have had literally to dig themselves out, and it is a slow, laboring and costly process. There is a magnificient and alluring field for inventive genius, in the problem of dealing with the snow, which, lying for days, and even weeks in our northern cities, is a menace to health, and inflicts losses in trade that sometimes can ill be borne.

By one class, the great storm was regarded as a benefactor. To the many thousands of unemployed it meant days of active labor, at good wages, with food and fuel for a multitude of cheerless homes. Thousands were thus employed in removing the snowy barriers to street traffic, and still other thousands along the railroad and trolley routes.

Gangs of men with pick and shovel, were seen in every direction, and sturdy laborers were in demand by business concerns, transportation companies, steamship lines etc. who were affected by the blockade.

The storm of February 14, 1894, together with one that followed on its heels and lasted for the two days, brought a snowfall of twenty-one inches but the temperature much of the time was far below the freezing point. It is interesting to note the large number of snow storms that have come in the month of February. Of fifteen snow storms entered in the following table between January, 1893, and February, 1899, seven have been in February. The figures are furnished by the U. S. Weather Bureau:

PILING THE SNOW ON DUMP-CARTS

THE "SNOW-MELTER" IN OPERATION

A FAMILY SNOWED IN—165TH STREET, NEW YORK

In this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD (on this and the preceding page) is presented the third article in our new Photographic Series of Scenes from Life in leading American cities. These photographs were taken under trying circumstances. In former issues, two interesting and beautifully illustrated articles of the series appeared. One on the Fire Department of New York pictured the perils of a fireman's career, showed some of the wonderful mechanical appliances of the Department and the men and engines actively engaged in fighting conflagration. A second gave realistic photographic scenes among a peculiar class of the cosmopolitan population of New York — the sidewalk venders. These constitute a class hardly to be found in any other American city, but known in the great capitals abroad, although there is probably a greater industrial variety and an odder jumble of nationalities here than anywhere else. In this issue the blizzard interposes itself as a subject well worthy the attention of our photographic artists, and as it has proved a phenomenal storm in every respect, the illustrations will be regarded as both interesting souvenirs of the most trying February in history, as far as weather conditions have been concerned.

For future issues of the Photographic Series, there are still greater attractions in prospect. Our next week's number will show scenes from life in the Hospitals and the Foundling Asylums of the metropolis—those magnificent institutions where science and philanthropy go hand in hand to relieve human suffering.

THE SNOW-PLOUGH AT WORK ON BROADWAY

THE FAMILY AND HOME CIRCLE

By the "Smithy" Fire

Fascinations of the Forge. The "Old Iron" Pennies

ALL of us who in childhood had a peep into a smithy are ready to testify to the fascination it has for children. The dark interior, the red coals, the brawny blacksmith working the bellows with one hand while grasping with the other the long tongs holding the glowing metal in the fire, the flashing transference of metal to anvil, the swinging hammer, the flying sparks, the ringing strokes—all go to make a sooty, sparkling mystery and merry motion and music that appeals strongly to childish fancy. Sometimes, as a mark of his distinguished favor, a blacksmith we remember let one of us work the bellows; then the other lads and lasses were green with envy and jealousy until the smith, to bring about a better state of mind, let each one take a turn—much to his personal hindrance. It was fun to watch horses being shod. How clever of them to stand still and put up their hoofs so neatly on the smith's knee! But, we reflected, how very fortunate that little boys and girls didn't have to be shod that way!

Once upon a time a lively industry developed in a certain neighborhood when the smith gave out that he would buy old bits of iron. Roads and fields were scoured for shoes cast by mules and horses; old nails and bolts and bars were rich finds. Simultaneously, candy and gingercake trade improved at the village store. But one day "Teacher" told of how little girls in cities met together and sewed garments for the poor; and of how others sent little tenement children to a fresh-air home in the summer. The result was that the children decided to apply their pennies to some good use. "Teacher" made a little pasteboard box with a slot in it, and there was great eagerness to see who could drop in most pennies. The kindly smith paid more than market value for wares, and accepted produce that he could not use. The children felt a sense of weighty responsibility when their bank held three dollars; and indulged in wild dreams of educating an orphan, sending a missionary to Africa and other ambitious philanthropies.

At this time an affliction befell the village; the smithy took fire and burnt up; in efforts to save his property, the smith's arm was hurt in way that would disable him for months. He had a wife and little ones. Lying sick and helpless on his bed, not knowing how needs for the morrow would be met, he saw a long procession of school-children filing through his gate. They brought a purse which neighbors had made up for him, but before giving this, they presented with great pomp and ceremony, their precious pasteboard bank and all its holdings.

The smithy has often been a school of education from which many famous men have graduated; as witness: Faraday, the blacksmith's son; Newcomen, to whom next to Watts, we owe the steam-engine; Elihu Burritt, the "learned blacksmith," and Robert Collyer, New York's great preacher. Burritt mastered forty languages and dialects while working at his forge.

Homeless Children

At the National Congress of Mothers just held in Washington, Dr. Hart, Superintendent of Illinois Children's Home and Aid Society, and General Secretary of National Conference of Charities and Correction, said of helpless and dependent children that the only way in which the evil influences of heredity could be counteracted and healthy bodies and good character developed, is through good environment, supplied by wise and humane measures adopted by society. Much popular effort is directed to filling childless homes with homeless children, and this work is best done in France, Australia, Massachusetts, Michigan and Minnesota.

"It is the ideal method," said Dr. Hart, "but its great danger lies in the direction of cheap, careless and superficial work. It is easy to find some one who will receive a homeless child from any one of several motives. It is difficult to make discriminating selections of homes and to exercise a continuous and faithful supervision during the minority of the child." If Dr. Hart should visit our Children's Home during the coming summer, he will see how happily home influences and institutional life are combined.

GETTING THE HORSE-SHOE READY

A "Loving Heart"

Sissy had just finished telling the younger children an old-time story about how fairies, at a child's birth, gathered about the cradle and endowed it with various gifts, beauty, wisdom, riches, honor, fame, long life, kingly coronets, etc. The children began to choose which they would have taken. Finally papa was appealed to. "Which would you choose for me—and me—and me to have?" they asked him. Papa looked at them all thoughtfully; it took him some time to decide; then he answered, his eyes shining, as if a mist had gathered in them: "A loving heart, my dears. The fairies are not, my dears, but God is, and God can give this to you each and all. A loving heart—it will keep you from hating, from bearing false witness, from murder and all sins. It is what Jesus meant when he said: 'Love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. On these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets.'"

Papa's "Doll"

"You have no papa to give you presents," said Rose, sympathetically, to her papa, as she sat on his knee caressing her new doll.

"Oh, yes," said her papa, looking tenderly into her eyes. "I have a Father who gave me you."

"Am I your doll, papa?" laughed she.

"A nice doll," said papa, "with eyes that can open and shut, a little red mouth that can say 'I love you,' and little feet that run to meet me. Besides you, my Father gave me your brothers and sisters, gave me your lovely mamma."

The little maid mused awhile. "Your father gives you the nicest things, but"—her face lighted loyally—"I'm satisfied with dolly, papa; I'm satisfied with what you give me."

And papa, as he explained how his Father, the good God, was hers also, wondered if he were as loyal to this Father—as grateful for God's wonderful and perfect gifts as was his little daughter with the inanimate toys he brought her.

Love unto the loveless give.

A Lapland Wedding

There are some primitive ways of wooing in Lapland. When a young Laplander wants a maiden for his wife, he runs a race with her, and is so handicapped that she can win or lose as she pleases. If she wins, it is evidence that she does not care for him, and he must not propose again. If she loses, then he can ask her parents' consent to marriage, and if that is obtained, banns are published and the wedding takes place. Her dowry and her wedding presents are usually reindeer, and she and her husband live with her parents for a year.

A Soldier Boy

HE went to the war in the morning,
[illegible]
But he paused at the gate, with his mother,
For a kiss and a comforting word.

He was eager to march and labor
For his country new laurels to weave,
He was proud of the cause of his sabre
And the chevrons of gold on his sleeve.

He came from the war in the evening;
[illegible]
The drums and the fifes were all silent
And the stripes of the soldiers were furled.

He was wrapped in the flag of his country,
When they laid him away in the mold,
With the glittering stars of a captain
Crossing his chevrons of gold.

With the heroes who sleep on the hillside
He lies with a flag at his head;
But blind with the years of her weeping
His mother yet mourns for her dead.

The soldiers who fall in the battle
May feel but a moment of pain,
But the dear ones who wait in the home-[illegible]
Ah! theirs are the woes that remain.

Algerian School Maidens

ALGERIAN schools are very interesting. In them one finds Europeans, native Jewesses and Arabians of Moslem faith, studying side by side, wearing their different national costumes, keeping their different Sabbaths. An Algerian teacher graphically describes, in Travel, a visit from a distinguished inspector of French schools, his wife and daughter to the Arab classroom, where all the girls scrupulously veiled themselves that "Si" (the learned man) might not discern the color of their eyes, shape of their noses, or size of their ears.

One heard them whispering to each other, "Take care, I can see a lock of your hair;" or, "Do not pull your veil so tight, I see the form of your chin! What would your father say if he knew it? Or your brother?"

To his questions they gave answers in very good French; their reading, counting, and exercise books pleased him. The import of some of their answers was amusing and disconcerting, as the following shows:

"What is Paris?" A girl replied: "A fiendish town where no proper woman is to be [illegible] everybody." Another struck in: "A beautiful town full of gold, even as the prophet will build one for us."

These were not the answers that the "Si" had expected, and while he hesitated, confused, they questioned in their turn. "Is that thy wife?" "Yes," said the poor gentle [illegible] did rejoinder. "She is good," was the husband's gallant retort. "Then, if thou art rich, keep her still, but buy another."

The lady's face (she was plain) flushed, and the teacher created a diversion by asking the gentleman to withdraw to the garden, that the girls might unveil their faces for the ladies. The Arabs chatted eagerly to the younger European lady; wanted to touch her watch, bracelets, shoes, etc. Her Parisian bearing, freedom to come and go in the great world, to give herself in marriage as she wills, all made her an object of curious interest to these poor young creatures, according to whose religious code wives are chattels and polygamy is right.

A Plea for Dumb Animals

A reader, writing from Lakefield, N. J., and signing himself, "One of God's servants whose heart bleeds for the poor, helpless dumb animals," says:

I see draymen who, with small teams, overload their beasts, then thrash, jerk and pound them because they cannot move faster. If, like Balaam's ass, the belabored beasts could speak, I can hear them say: "Master, we are doing all we can for you. Please do not whip us so, nor jerk our mouths so. We are tired and sore from over-work and abuse. In your thought, change places with us; and we know you will be more merciful and kind. O, that the angel of God would appear and speak to you as he did to Balaam and speak for us!" Cannot THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, through its many readers, prevail on the ministry of the world to set apart one Sabbath in the year to offer up prayer for, and to preach in behalf of God's poor dumb animals? I don't believe their sufferings can ever be done away with only as it is done through our Lord.

Truth and Politeness—The Castellanes' House-Warming—Poultry-keeping Profitable, etc.

A LADY spent a half hour with me to-day, and went away saying several very gracious and agreeable things, to which I responded by an expression of thanks. She was very good and very kind to tell me that she had enjoyed her call, and to repeat one or two pleasant bits of conversation which she had had with a common friend of us both, and the least I could do in the case was most courteously to show my gratitude.

After she had left me, Evangeline, sitting with her book in a corner of the parlor, looked up quizzically and observed, "I think you were both very funny. Mrs. —— is not one of your dear friends, and you are not one of hers; you never met before and you may never meet again, yet you were as ceremonious and as careful to say nice things to one another, as though you belonged to a queen's court."

"Well, Evangeline," I answered, "would you have had me do what a woman once did when an acquaintance, meeting her, said, "I have missed you very much; it is a delight to see you out again and to know that you are taking up your old work, and you are certainly looking the better for your rest and your journey." The person, thus kindly effusive, felt as if she had received a dash of cold water in her face when the answer came flatly:

"I don't believe you really mean a word you say, but it's very pleasant to hear you talk."

If anything can surpass that speech in rudeness, I have yet to hear it.

THE FACT is, friends, that there is no difficulty in being both sincere and polite. Good manners spring from kindness of heart. The spirit and essence of truth should be in our words, and so should also be the graceful form of a perfect courtesy. If friends take the trouble to visit us, we should welcome them cordially and be glad to see them. When we have made a visit, or spent an evening agreeably, our impulse should be to say to our entertainers, "We have enjoyed the time with you, and hope to see you soon again." There is no insincerity in observing conventionalities; there may be an equally mistaken idea of right and wrong in ignoring them.

Take the matter a little farther, and let us proceed from what we say to people when they are with us, to what we say concerning them behind their backs.

Evangeline and I were talking on that subject the other day, and I told her the old story of the good mother who always found a kind thing to say about everybody. Said her son, "I really believe, dear mamma, that you could find something to praise in Beelzebub himself!" "Well," she replied, "we might imitate his industry and perseverance." That is as far as any one could go, is it not? A dear lady whom I love, always speaks in praise of the absent, or if not in praise, then in excuse, and where she can neither excuse nor praise, she is silent. She simply will not speak evil of her neighbor.

We are so complex, so many-sided, so mingled in our character in its various elements that if we can but look beneath the surface we shall discover some good in the most unpromising. I think our Heavenly Father looks tenderly and lovingly on his children, all of them, even if they are froward and imperfect, and at the first sign of penitence, how swift is he to pardon, and how gently he receives us into his arms. Man may be relentless, but God is ever ready to be forgiving, and while

God's in His heaven,
All's right with the world.

OF COURSE we all admire Helen Gould, whose rare generosity and true patriotism have endeared her to her fellow Americans. Her sister, Anna Gould, who married a nobleman of France, Count Castellane, is proving herself worthy to be a great lady in the best sense of the phrase. The Castellanes have been building a magnificent house, and the other day this was finished, and its owners gave their first party. They invited to share their hospitality the workmen — carpenters, masons, laborers, and indeed, everyone whose hands had wrought any part of the edifice, with their wives and children. They all came, four or five hundred people, large and small, young boys and girls, children of assorted sizes and babies in arms, and the Count and Countess, with their children, stood at the head of a grand staircase, and received their guests and made them welcome. Tables were spread with choice viands, there was music, there were flags and flowers, and the home was thus first enjoyed by the friends who had helped to rear its walls and spread its roof, and adorn its stately grounds.

A POULTRY SHOW in Madison Square Garden, New York, with beautiful fowls and chickens and hens, large and small, on exhibition, has drawn crowds of society people, and it is interesting to hear the comments of the gaily dressed women as they look at the feathered beauties. I don't specially care for domestic fowls myself; they appeal to me, however, on the economic side, for women may support themselves very comfortably by raising poultry for market, and by selling eggs and broilers. Necessarily, if women undertake such an enterprise, they must study the best ways of feeding and sheltering fowls, and they must be reasonably near a town or city, where they sell their products. Many a farmer's wife owes every small luxury she possesses to her egg-money.

WE WERE sitting round the fire just before bedtime, grandmother with her knitting, Henry busy over examples for school the next day, Susie drawing a map, father reading a paper, and everybody more or less busy, when little Martin asked us to stop and listen to him.

"I've got to speak a piece to morrow," he said. "It's Declamation Day." "What piece are you going to speak?" I inquired.

"Kipling's 'Recessional,'" said our young man of eleven, striking an oratorical attitude and beginning:

"God of our fathers, known of old,
Lord of our far-flung battle line,
Beneath whose awful hand we hold
Dominion over palm and pine,
Lord, God of Hosts, be with us yet,
Lest we forget, lest we forget."

No poem written in recent years has struck the popular heart as that happy thought of the gifted Englishman. As our laddie recited it, I fancied its appropriateness to us in America, for we, too, have this year a "far flung battle-line." A regiment of regulars, for fourteen years on our frontier, starts, as I write, from a Western fort, where the temperature is 26 degrees below zero, to change their encampment at last in the tropic Philippine Islands. We watch these American soldiers with wistful eyes, and hope that our new policy of expansion means the beginning of a better and brighter day, and the extension of Christ's kingdom. We women, hoping, believing, and praying, long for a reign of peace, white-robed and beautiful, upon this tempest-tossed earth. May a day dawn in our time when men shall not mow each other down with deadly weapons; when counsel shall take the place of cannon balls and serenity shall follow in the wake of Christian progress and civilization. Every battle gained means many widows and orphans.

"A BEAUTIFUL POSSIBILITY"

A New and Charming Serial Story, Written Exclusively for "The Christian Herald"

CHAPTER SIX

Down from the Mountain

THE time of Evadne's stay in Vernon drew near its close, and on the last day but one she went to say good-by to Penelope Riggs. She found her sitting alone in the house, her mother having taken a fancy to have a sun bath. Her right hand was doubled up, and she was rubbing it slowly up and down the palm of her left, while she sang softly.

"Why, Penelope, what are you doing?" cried Evadne in amaze.

"Polishin', child. I learnt it long ago. One day I was that wore out I wouldn't have cared much if the sky had fallen—things had been goin' crooked and mother hadn't slept well for a fortnight, and I was that narvous and tuckered out I thought I'd fly to pieces. There's an old hymn mother's dredful fond of. I don't remember how it goes now, but there's one line she keeps repeatin' over and over till I feel ready to jump. It's this:

What dvin wurms we be.

So when she begun her wurm song that mornin' I just let fly. 'If I am a wurm,' sez I, 'I aint goin' to be alwers lookin' to see myself squirm, and with that I up an out of the house. My head was that tight inside, I telt if I didn't get out that minit somethin' would snap. I went straight up to Mis Everidge's. She's one of the people, you see, who always lives on a hill, inside and out. When I got there, I couldn't speak. My heart's weak at the best ot times an the weather in there was pretty stormy. I just dropped into the first chair, an she put her hands on my two shoulders, and sez she:

"'You poor child!' and then she went away and made me a syllabub.

"'Look on the bright side,' sez she in her cheery way, when I had finished drinkin'.

"'Sakes alive, Mis Everidge,' sez I, 'there isn't any bright side!'

"'Then polish up the dark one,' sez she as quick as a flash. I've been tryin' to do it ever since."

"You dear Penelope!" exclaimed Evadne, "I think you have!"

"It's all a wale child, a wale of tears," old Mrs. Riggs complained as she bade her good-by in the porch, but when she reached the turn in the road she heard Penelope singing:

Thy way, not mine, O Lord,
However dark it be!
Lead me by thine own hand:
Choose out my path for me.
I dare not choose my lot.
I would not if I might:
Choose thou for me, my God
So shall I walk aright.

And Evadne knew that in the brave heart the voice of Christ had made the storm a calm.

All the remainder of that time must be given to Aunt Marthe, and it was all too short for all the questions to be put on the one side and the help to be given on the other.

"You dear Aunt Marthe! How am I ever going to thank you for all you have been to me and what shall I do without you?" Evadne spoke the words wistfully. They were making the most of their last evening.

"Why, dear child, we can always be together in spirit. 'It is not distance in miles that separates peoples, but distance in feeling.' Emerson says, 'A man really lives where his thought is,' so you can be in Vernon, and I in Marlborough, each of us held close in the hush of God's love, which 'in its breadth is a girdle that encompasses the globe and a mantle that [illegible]

Evadne caught Mrs. Everidge's face between her hands and kissed it reverently.

"I mean to devote my life to making other people happy—as you do my saint," she said.

* * *

"Board!" The conductor's cry of warning smote the air, and the train passengers made a final bustle of preparation for a start. Mrs. Everidge caught Evadne close in a last embrace.

"My precious little sister—I shall miss you every day!"

Then she was gone, and Evadne looked eagerly out of her window, saw the dear face from which the tears had been swept away, smiling brightly at her from the platform.

The train steamed into the station at Marlborough, and again Louis came forward to greet her with a look of admiration on his unusually animated face.

"Well done, Evadne! If the atmosphere of Vernon can work such transformation as this, it ought to be bottled up and sold at twenty dollars the dozen. You go away looking like a snow wraith, and you return a blooming Hebe."

Evadne laughed merrily. "Thank you. The atmosphere of Vernon has a wonderful power, but it was not of material ozone she was thinking as she spoke.

"I believe I will try it. Will you vouch for like good results in my case?"

Evadne shook her head. "I do not believe it will have the same effect upon everyone," she said slowly.

"Ah! then I shall be compelled to go to Europe."

"Yes," she said, "I think Europe would suit you better."

"That is unfortunate—for the Judge's purse. How is Aunt Marthe?"

"She is well," she answered, with a sudden stillness in her voice. "How is Uncle Lawrence, and all the others?"

"The Judge is in his usual state of health. The others are well, and Isabelle, having just returned from the metropolis of Fashion, is more than ever au fait in the usages of polite society. But none of them have improved like you, little coz. What has changed you so?"

And she answered softly, with a new light shining in her eyes, "Jesus Christ."

"You poor Evadne," said Marion that evening. "What a dreary summer you must have had, shut away among those stupid mountains! If you could only have been with me now; I never had such a lovely vacation in my life. There seemed to be some excitement every day, —picnics and boating parties and tennis matches and five o'clocks——"

Evadne laughed. "You had better not let Uncle Horace know you are a 'votary of the deadly five o'clock,' or he will empty his vials of denunciation upon your unlucky head. Oh, Aunt Kate, he sent you a whole bundle of fraternal greetings! He says—I can remember his exact words — viewed through the glamor of memory, you impress him like an Alpine landscape, when the sun is rising, and that he hopes the soft brilliance of prosperity will ever envelop you in its radiance and serve to enhance the beauty of your stately calm."

Mrs. Hildreth smiled, well pleased. "Horace is so poetical," she said, "but all the Everidges are clever. What a shame it seems that a man of his talent should be forced by ill-health to exist in a place where there is not a single soul capable of appreciating his rare qualities. Even his wife does not begin to understand him. It seems like casting pearls before swine."

Evadne's eyes flashed and her lips pressed themselves tightly together, but Mrs. Hildreth's gaze was fixed intently upon the lace shawl she was knitting, and Louis just then gave a sudden turn to the conversation.

She went up to her room with a great homesickness surging in her heart. Only last night all had been lightsome and happy, now the old darkness seemed to be settled down about her again. She knelt before her window and looked at the strip of sky which was all a Marlborough residence allowed her.

"Happy stars!" she murmured, "for you are shining on Aunt Marthe!"

Far into the night she knelt there, until a great peace flooded her soul. She raised her hands towards the sparkling sky.

"To do the little there is in my power to make the world brighter, to make the world better. To lift the world nearer to God! Blessed Christ that was thy mission, I will make it mine!"

The next morning Louis drew her aside. "So little coz, you did not coincide with the lady mother's eulogium of our respected collateral last night?"

"Why, I said nothing!" cried Evadne in astonishment.

Louis laughed.

"Have you never heard of eyes that speak, and faces that tell tales?" he said. "I will just whisper a word of warning, before you play havoc with your web of destiny. Don't let a suspicion of your dislike cross the lady mother's mind, for Uncle Horace is her beau ideal of a man. I agree with you, I think he is a cad."

CHAPTER XX

Conflicting Engagements

"An invitation to Professor Joliette's," and Isabelle tossed a gilt-edged card across the table to Marion. "Wednesday evening. It's not a very long invitation. What dress will you wear?"

"But you are engaged, Marion," said Evadne. "Wednesday evening is prayer-meeting, you know."

"Yes," said Marion, with a sigh, "it is awkward. I do wish they would choose some other night for prayer-meeting. Wednesday seems such a favorite with everybody."

"What a little prig you are getting to be, Evadne!" said Isabelle, with a sneer; "your only diversion seems to be prayer-meeting and church. You are as bad as Aunt Marthe."

* * *

"It is so provoking that we cannot have the carriage," grumbled Isabelle as, when Wednesday evening came, they waited for Louis in the dining-room. "At the Joliettes' of all places. I'm sure I don't see, Papa, why you cannot insist upon Pompey's taking some other night off, when we need him on Wednesday. It is horribly awkward."

Her father shook his head as he slowly peeled an orange.

"Because I have given him my word, my dear. The only stipulation he made when I engaged him was that he should not be required to drive on Sundays and Wednesday evenings, and when I hear people complaining about their surly, incapable coachmen, I consider it is a light price to pay. Pompey is as sober as a church and as pleasant-tempered in a rain storm as a water spaniel, no matter what hour of the night you keep him waiting; so it is the least we can do to let the poor fellow be sure of one evening to himself." and the Judge opened his Times and began to study the money market.

"Well, said Isabelle, crossly, "I, for one, don't believe in allowing servants to have such cast-iron rules; it savors too much of Socialism."

"I don't wonder the poor child is annoyed," said Mrs. Hildreth, after the trio had departed. "It is very embarrassing, when people know we keep a carriage—and the Joliettes are such sticklers in all matters of etiquette. It is a ridiculous fad of yours, Lawrence, to be so punctilious."

"But, my dear, I gave him my word of honor."

"What if you did? There are exceptions to every rule."

"Not in the Hildreth code of honor."

"Nonsense! What does a colored coachman understand about that."

"Why, Evadne, you cannot go to prayer-meeting alone," she exclaimed, as Evadne came into the room with her hat and cloak on. Your uncle is busy and I am too tired, so there is no way for you to get home."

"I am going to Dyce's church, Aunt Kate; Pompey will bring me home."

"Among a lot of shouting negroes! You must be crazy, child!"

"Their souls are white, Aunt Kate; and there is no color line on the Rock of Ages."

"Oh, well, tastes differ," said her aunt, carelessly; "but it is a strange fancy for Judge Hildreth's niece. Next thing, you will suggest going to board with Pompey."

"I might fare a good deal worse," said Evadne, with her soft laugh. "Dyce keeps her rooms like a new pin, and she is a capital cook."

"Really, Evadne, I am in despair! You have not an iota of proper pride. How are you going to maintain your position in society?"

"I don't believe I care to test the question, Aunt Kate, but I think my position will maintain itself."

"Well said, Evadne!" said her uncle, looking up from his paper. "You will never forget you are a Hildreth, eh?"

"Higher than that, uncle," said Evadne softly; "I am trying to be a sister of Jesus Christ."

A Good Complexion

Depends on Good Digestion.

This is almost an axiom, although usually we are apt to think that cosmetics, face powders, lotions, fancy soaps, etc., are the secret for securing a clear complexion.

But all these are simply superficial assistants. It is impossible to have a good complexion unless the digestive organs perform their work properly; unless the stomach by properly digesting the food taken into it furnishes an abundance of pure blood a good complexion is impossible.

That is the reason so many ladies are using Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets, because they promptly cure any stomach trouble, and they have found out that perfect digestion means a perfect complexion and one that does not require cosmetics and powders to enhance its beauty.

Many ladies diet themselves or deny themselves many articles of food solely in order to keep their complexion clear.

When Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets are used no such dieting is necessary. Take these tablets and eat all the good, wholesome food you want and you need have no fear of indigestion nor the sallow dull complexion which nine women out of ten have, solely because they are suffering from some form of indigestion.

Bear in mind that beauty proceeds from good health, good health results from perfect digestion and we have advanced the best argument to induce every man or woman to give this splendid remedy a trial.

Stuart's Dyspepsia Tablets can be found in drug stores and cost 50 cents per package. They are prepared by the F. A. Stuart Co., Marshall, Mich.

If there is any derangement of the stomach or bowels they will remove it and the resultant effects are good digestion, good health and a clear, bright complexion. Ask your druggist for the tablets and a free book on stomach diseases.

A Titled Evangelist

The Countess Schimelmann in Chicago — Her Missionary Yacht

IN a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, an account was given of the remarkable history of Countess Adeline Schimelmann, a German lady of noble birth who has devoted her life and fortune to the Master's service.

COUNTESS ADELINE SCHIMELMANN

The Countess, who recently came to this country on her yacht Duen (Dove), is living at the present time in Chicago, and is engaged in evangelistic work there. As soon as she reached the Western metropolis, people and press made her welcome, churches of different creeds invited her to occupy their pulpits, ladies of wealth and high social position requested drawing-room talks of her; and workingmen of all nationalities crowded the halls where she made addresses. Her plans for work in Chicago include public meetings, and Bible classes in English, German and Danish; the conversion of the Duen into a free coffee and tea kitchen for the hungry; the establishment of a Gospel mission ship stationed at Chicago for the benefit of sailors and 'longshoremen of the lakes; and a workshop, for the relief of those out of work. Toilers of the sea have, more than all other peoples, the strongest hold upon her heart. Among the poverty-stricken fishermen of the Baltic provinces, her pious ministries began, and the Countess says: 'I am to spend the spring and summer of each year with these seafaring children of mine, among whom I lived my first happy years of Christian service."

It was in last July that she reached America: her yacht entering the St. Lawrence and sailing up the river and through the great lakes, touching at each town in passing; and meetings held in harbors, market-places, parks and churches, although unheralded by advertisement, were largely attended. High and low, rich and poor thronged the decks of the yacht to see a lady who had determinately surrendered wealth and a high position in a European court, to win souls for Christ. Since the purchase of the Duen in 1895, the Countess has visited all important European seaports; holding meetings in halls, sailors' homes, and churches, distributing literature, and rendering relief in many forms to maimed and afflicted seamen and their families. She and her crew of Gospel helpers have five languages at command; her trained and consecrated young sailors are effective assistants. Records for the past year show that 511 ships have been visited; over 20,000 Gospels, tracts and good books in ten languages distributed; and countless addresses delivered to audiences ranging from a little group of listeners to multitudes which overflowed immense halls.

The Countess has been one of many vicissitudes. From the German court where she was Maid of Honor to the Empress Augusta, to her two-room cottage among the fisher-folk on the Island of Rugen, was of itself a sharper contrast than occurs in most lives. The favor, encouragement and assistance of the Emperor and Empress followed her in her self-sacrificing labors, and her winters were spent in part at the palace; but her family disapproved of what they felt to be a needless waste of her opportunities and fortune; her commitment to an asylum and release therefrom because the authorities were convinced of her sanity, has been previously related in this paper. Her American trip has not been free from dangerous incident and from what the Countess speaks of as Providential rescue from danger. At Detroit, she started to go ashore, while the Duen, on account of the passing alongside of a great steamer was rocking very much; the gangway slipped, and down sank the lady in a spot which Detroit people call the "Death Trap," because of the fact that, at that point, swinging ships, submarine timbers and driftwood of various kinds catch and crush almost anything that falls among them. The Countess realized her peril, but never lost her faith nor suffered fear to master her; she was sinking for the third time, when the mate, a watchman, and her adopted son Paul, succeeded with infinite difficulty, in reaching and rescuing her. While under the water, she says the thought came to her "I am not going to die. This call to America was too clear. God does not change his plans. There is work for me to do."

The Duen once belonged to Prince Waldemor, of Denmark, brother of the Princess of Wales; who with the late Queen of Denmark and other royal ladies have been contributors to the Countess's mission work. This work she defines as threefold: "To fisher-folk of the Baltic; sailors of all nations in as many ports of the world as the Duen can reach; to the distressed, troubled and sinful everywhere." She has had large experience in dealing with the drink problem, and believes the best and most effective plan to be that which she has followed to the extent of her powers in the Baltic provinces and elsewhere, by establishing coffee-houses and placing in all possible ways wholesome and seasonable food and drink within easy reach of the working classes, who often take intoxicants because they are cheaper and more convenient than other drinks. She also believes that material help to be practical, must be accompanied by sympathy and personal intercourse.

REFUGE

ALONE in the storm and dark of night,
Trembling I crouched in keen affright.
For the trials of life swept over me,
Like the seething waves of an angry sea:
When lo! a voice, sweet, strong and clear,
As I trembled there in abject fear,
To my storm-tossed soul said tenderly:
"If thou would'st lose thy misery
And gain for thyself eternity,
Take up thy cross and follow me."

Chautauqua's Founder Dead

A Life of Great Interest and Usefulness Ended at Three-score and Ten

A LIFE of great usefulness ended when Lewis Miller, founder and President of the Chautauqua Assembly, passed away on the morning of Friday, February 17, in the Post Graduate Hospital, in New York City. Features of peculiar sadness were connected with his decease, inasmuch as he died away from home, at the end of a long journey undertaken with the hope of relief from a desperate malady. His train was snow-bound en route, he suffered much from the detention, was in a very enfeebled condition and did not survive the shock of the operation for which he had come, and in the prompt performance of which lay his one hope of recovery. His physician, Dr. Leonard and his daughter Mary, were the companions of his journey. Mr. Miller is survived by his wife and eight children, one of whom is Mrs. Thomas A. Edison, wife of the famous inventor. Mr. and Mrs. Edison, Miss Miller and a brother from Cornell, were at Mr. Miller's bedside when he died, and accompanied the remains to Akron.

Mr. Miller was born in Greentown, Ohio, nearly seventy years ago. He early learned the trade of a machinist, and then turned his attention to the invention of agricultural machinery, in which he was so successful as to amass great wealth, in the disbursement of which he was wise and generous. Educational institutions, not only in Ohio, but throughout the union, benefitted by his liberality. In Akron, Ohio, where his later years were spent, Mr. Miller conceived and designed the Akron model Sunday School, which has been generally adopted as a standard of excellence. He was a faithful attendant on divine services at the Methodist Episcopal Church, of which he was a member, and was active in all good works. His generosity knew no church lines nor limit of creed.

His greatest work was the creation of the Chautauqua Assembly, to which he gave without stint his time, labor and money; only after years of earnest effort was he able to bring it to the successful organized form which it took on in 1874.

An Ohio pioneer, the life-long friend of President McKinley, father of two soldiers in the Spanish-American war, father-in-law of the most famous inventor of our times, an inventor himself of many machines that lightened agricultural labor, president at his death of three plants producing his inventions, founder of the world's Model Sunday School, President of the Board of Trustees of Mount Union College, Ohio, founder and president of the Chautauqua Assembly, this millionaire philanthropist who accomplished so much and benefitted so many by his work and genius, had indeed lived a life that brought him in touch with wide and varied human interests. The announcement of his death caused heartfelt sorrow to many, but the story of his life and accomplishments is an encouragement and an inspiration in many ways.

The "Reform Bureau" and Its Work

The Reform Bureau, incorporated and international, with their headquarters in Washington, D. C., Rev. Wilbur F. Crafts, Superintendent, is doing a unique work in applied Christianity, seeking to help conversion before and after by creating a better moral environment; a work of preventive charity also, devoted to cutting off the vicious causes of poverty, intemperance, impurity, gambling, sabbath-breaking and the like. One of its purposes is "to substitute arbitration for both industrial and international war." Its four chief battles, at Washington, just now, are: (1) against the renewal of sectarian appropriations; (2) against the seating of the polygamist Congressman-elect from Utah; (3) against the repeal of Alaskan prohibition; (4) against beer-selling "canteens" in the army. On this last it has just won a signal victory in the house, and the battle is transferred to the senate. The Bureau is on the "firing line," but like our soldiers on San Juan Hill, without ammunition and provisions, save as its chief officer, like Roosevelt, (but without Roosevelt's wealth), draws on his own purse. The habit of Christians is to give mostly to three things, their local church, local charity and foreign missions. It is not yet customary to give to the nation, except in military campaigns. The Bureau helps with valuable rebates of literature, books, papers and leaflets, those who help it by membership fees, which are, $100, $50, $12, $5, $2.00 and $1.00. All contributions in aid of the work of the Reform Bureau, and all applications for membership, should be forwarded to Dr. Crafts, at headquarters, No. 210 Delaware Avenue, Washington, D. C. Dr. Crafts will also be pleased to answer all inquiries, concerning the Bureau and its work, that may be forwarded to him by readers of this journal.

Life

LIFE is a song, if we but wait
And let it sing its last sweet bars,
Its keynote struck by him who tuned
The melody of morning stars;
A stream whose fountain is the source
Of all we know of love and right,
A beam whose sun is central orb
In moral universe of light.

It matters not though many use
The life as 'twere continual feast;
From its vast store of priceless gifts
Choosing the lowest, poorest, least.
Life with its mysteries, limits, shades,
Is royal still, supremely grand,
If we but do the will of God
With loving heart and willing hand.

What it may be—how rare, how high,
Is shown in life of Man Divine—
In his earth-years of holy love,
The glories of our future shine:
Made in the image of the Lord,
A destiny immortal given,
Beyond all thought of ours to know,
In the pure light of love and heaven.

Can You be Convinced

THAT EUCALOL CURES CATARRH?

Our advertisements have proved convincing to thousands of fair-minded men and women in every walk of life—clergymen, lawyers, doctors, teachers and business men have been open to conviction and now endorse Eucalol Treatment.

Sir Morell Mackenzie says:

"Moisture of the mucous membrane of the nose is as essential to the sense of smell as that of the tongue is to taste."

The Eucalol Company, New York.

Gentlemen—I enclose you herewith one dollar for which please send me two boxes of your antiseptic powder and two of the cream by first mail.

I may say that I have suffered for years with nasal catarrh, and feel to-day that I have been completely cured by three weeks treatment of your Catarrh Cure. I have used one and a half boxes of the powder and about one tube of the cream. The last lot I received was for a particularly bad case of Ozena Fetid Catarrh. The person has had it from infancy and is now about fourteen years of age. He has been using your treatment about two weeks. The improvement is already quite noticeable; smell all gone; no crusts have formed since he commenced using it. I have great hope that with continued and systematic use of the medicine it will effect a complete cure.

Please send the stuff along by the first mail so that he will be in no danger of running out before the new lot arrives. Yours truly,
WM. REID.

Dear Sirs—Enclosed find N. Y. draft to pay for the package of Eucalol I received from you some time ago, which was seventy-five (75) cents, and also one dollar ($1), for which send me two packages of Eucalol. Your remedy has done me more good than anything I have tried. Yours truly,
JOHN J. PAUL.

Are you afflicted and STILL skeptical? Send us your name and address, and let us prove that EUCALOL does heal and does cure. If you are afflicted we know that EUCALOL will cure you! Don't delay—write to-day for our

Guarantee Trial Offer:

In order to prove the curative power of Eucalol and our confidence in it, we will gladly send to any reputable person, upon receipt of 75c., a complete treatment, with full directions, charges prepaid. If at the end of one month it has not benefited you, return it and your money will be returned at once.

Cleanliness is the first essential in the treatment of catarrh, the first symptom of which is stuffiness, sense of smell and taste blunted, and breathing through the mouth becomes necessary; dry mucous crusts form and have a tendency to become fetid. The only scientific treatment is an antiseptic wash to remove these crusts and the accumulated mucus, and the application of the antiseptic Eucalol Emollient. Dry air, vapor fumes, smoke, medicated air and cocaine preparations relieve temporarily and aggravate the disease. Did you ever hear of a physician treating catarrh with such means? The Eucalol Treatment antiseptically cleanses the nasal passage and applies the healing antiseptic Eucalol Emollient.

We refer to Bradstreet's or Dun's Commercial Agencies as to our standing.

We are anxious for every one subject to catarrh and cold in the head to try the Eucalol Treatment.

Fellowship in Service

Topic of the Christian Endeavor Society, Epworth League and Baptist Young People's Union for March 12. Nehemiah 4: 6; 16-43

HOW much may be accomplished by united effort, has been practically shown in many an historical incident since that of the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem. The lesson it teaches has been repeated in the history of every people. When a great project so appeals to the masses that they will sink their own interests, postpone their own enterprises, and unite in working for the public good, nothing can stand against them. Nehemiah's story of the work of his time is simply typical of a host of such instances. The people coming back from Babylon after their seventy years' exile, might naturally be expected to make it their first business to rebuild their own homes; but their religious and public spirit was so strong, that they gave their first energy and labor to restoring the temple and reconstructing the city wall. Still more significant was their sinking political and social differences, and working amicably and enthusiastically together in the common enterprise.

How much might have been accomplished in advancing Christ's kingdom in the world, if his followers had been of this disposition! One of our own preachers shrewdly suggests that the reason Satan is generally represented with a smile on his face, is that he has never seen this disposition in the Church. When he does see it he will begin to look serious. He has little to fear while Christ's people are quarrelling among themselves, and one denomination is holding aloof from another. It is marvellous that the Church should not have realized this fact, when it has looked around and seen countries sunk in heathen darkness, others blindly following false religions, and even in professedly Christian lands large numbers of people avowedly or practically infidel and vice and crime rampant. So much has to be done at home and abroad before the world is brought under the sweet and beneficent rule of Christ, that every arm is needed and every power organized in the service. Instead of this, we see disunion, the Church split up into factions and the hostilities which should be directed against the enemy manifested among rival denominations. There are now in this country nearly one hundred and fifty separate organizations, each bearing the name of Christ, and each apt on small provocation to turn its guns on the others instead of on the common enemy. We should be sorry to believe that the multiplication of denominations is the work of the devil, but he who cannot be ignorant of the maxim "divide and conquer," doubtless views these divisions with complacency.

The Church has realized the mischief of disunion in the past, and in recent years has endeavored to remove it. Many efforts have been made at various times to promote unity. The first method adopted was persecution. The Church of Rome carried this method to a fine art, with its inquisition and its repressive legislation, but it did not succeed. Union can never come by coercion. Of late, an idea has become popular that it may come by mutual concession, but neither has this succeeded. But a new clue to the solution of the problem has been developed which has in it a promise of elimination of some of the worst evils of disunion. The denominations have discovered that doctrinal differences need not prevent association in labor. As a clergyman said recently, "the next best thing to the removal of the separating fences is to have them so low, that the man on one side the fence can shake hands with the man on the other." The Young Men's Christian Association was one of the first conspicuous products of this method. Then came the Christian Endeavor Society, based on the same principle of union in Christian effort. It may be that here we have the key to the solution of the problem. The Baptist may still practise immersion, and the Episcopalian may keep his bishops, while both labor together as brethren to promote the cause of Christ, which both love, and to strive together for the spread of the Gospel.

RELIEF FROM RHEUMATICS..

Mr. W. H. Jenkins writes from Topeka, Kan., under date of August 5th, 1898:

"Several years ago I was stricken with rheumatism and for 16½ weeks I was unable to do business of any kind, and in that time I have expended nearly $3,000. I had given up all hope.

My mother in looking over the CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE saw your advertisement, and we ordered one bottle of your Tartarlithine, which gave me immediate relief.

I have recommended your medicine to a number of parties in this city, who have had chronic rheumatism for years. One of them, a lady 68 years of age, is now doing her own work. So far your medicine has not failed to make a cure.

In conclusion your medicine is just as represented, and has entirely eliminated the disease from my body. My mother is enthusiastic over the benefits that I have derived from the use of your medicine."

An Emperor's Pulpit

The Beautiful Gift Which Was Presented to Kaiser Wilhelm at Jerusalem

WHEN Emperor Wilhelm, of Germany, was in Palestine, a few months ago, the entire Christian world was deeply interested in his doings. In a letter from a correspondent in Jerusalem, which appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the story of the new German Evangelical Church of the Holy Redeemer on the site of the ancient Muristan, was told in detail. On that occasion the Emperor received from his loyal subjects in Jerusalem a beautiful and unique gift — a high-standing lectern or reading-desk with four pillars, the whole carved out of olive-wood grown in Palestine. With this desk there was also given a large, handsome Bible, the covers of which are of cedar-wood, exquisitely carved with the outline picture of the Church of the Holy Redeemer. The Bible itself is a fine piece of work. One side of the cover contains a bas-relief representation of the Church of the Redeemer, and on the other is the Jerusalem Cross. Both Bible and lecturn were designed by the architect of the church. The desk is supported by two angels, bearing the imperial German coat-of-arms, elaborately carved in cedar-wood from Mount Lebanon. The presentation address was delivered by Rev. Dr. Bliss, of the American College in Beirut.

THE LECTERN

The beautiful carving on the gift was the work of the establishment of Ferdinand Vester, who has received a royal patent as purveyor in recognition of the rare artistic skill displayed. Mr. Vester came from Elberfield forty-five years ago, and was the pioneer of the very large wood-carving industry in and around Jerusalem. He has a picturesque house near the Jaffa Gate.

Pilgrims to "Adam's Peak"

Adam's Peak, a rocky point of 7,420 feet, though not the highest is certainly the most striking mountain on the island of Ceylon, and it is the goal of every devout Buddhist, for here it is supposed the Great Buddha stood, one foot resting on the summit of the mountain and the other on the mainland; and is there not a huge footprint in the rock to testify to the fact? Hence Adam's Peak is sacred, and to Adam's Peak there is a steady flow of pilgrims at all seasons. Men, women and children make the ascent; none are too young and none are too old to climb the Peak, and by so doing rid themselves of the burden of their sins; and should they slip and fall and be killed in the attempt (for one side of the mountain is dangerous), they would be all the happier, for would not their sins be all blotted out at one full swoop, and would they not be hurried into Nirvana, the aim of every right-minded Buddhist?

R & G CORSETS

The kind that do not stretch

R & G Corsets are the best for the following reasons:

They fit. They wear. They hold their shape.

They are made in a sufficient variety of styles to fit any figure

They are the same size from the day you first put them on till you discard them forever.

They are modeled on a perfect, natural, human form, and their shape is made absolutely permanent by stretching over our steam-heated iron forms.

By this process, which we control exclusively, every atom of stretch is taken out of the goods. The corsets are dampened and clamped down on the hollow iron form with a pressure of six hundred pounds. Then the steam is turned into the form and the corset dries.

When a dress is made over an R & G Corset you need never fear that the corset will "give" and so put undue strain on the dress seams. If the waist fits the corset once, it fits it always—you can depend on it.

The material used in the R & G Corsets is good. We don't say much about materials because any manufacturer can buy good material. It isn't material that makes a corset good—it is brains, and skill, and careful work.

We put the same brains and skill into our dollar corsets that we do into our four-dollar ones. The fit and style are just the same—the pattern is just the same. The four-dollar corset is prettier—more fancy, that's all. So far as style, fit, comfort and wear are concerned, our dollar corsets are as good as the more expensive ones—and better than expensive ones of any other make.

Our new Number 397 is perhaps the most wholly satisfactory corset we ever made. It is particularly desirable for the present dress styles. It is a short corset, but has length enough in the bust and over the hips to bring out all the good points of the figure.

It is made in drab, white and black, and can be had in 10,000 stores. If you have any trouble getting it, send us your dollar, tell us your size and your dealer's name, and we will see that you get the corset.

Send for our Free Booklet, "CHOOSING A CORSET." It will give you corset facts that you should know.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS

The proposition is made for a general and possibly world-wide celebration at the ushering in of the new century—the nineteen-hundredth anniversary of the Christian religion. Already many suggestions have been offered as to the form such a celebration should take, but none has proved wholly satisfactory. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD invites its readers everywhere to take an active personal interest in this approaching great spiritual event, and it will be glad to receive from them suggestions as to the Celebration, including outlines of proposed programmes. It should be remembered that in such a grand undertaking all Christendom will be actively involved. Churches, religious bodies, societies and Sunday Schools innumerable, and regardless of denomination, will join in honoring the great Head of the Church by such a Celebration as the world has never yet witnessed. A multitude of ideas instantly arise in the mind associated with this great anniversary, and the problem is how to choose, how to arrange, how to plan such a programme.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will be pleased to receive and will publish all the practical suggestions its readers may send. As far as possible, those suggestions should each take the form of a programme, in which the duration of the celebration, the part to be taken by churches and Sunday Schools, and the general form of the exercises, are to be considered; also whether it should take place at one or more central points of assemblage, or simultaneously throughout the Christian world. To stimulate interest in this subject, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD will present numerous valuable prizes to the senders of programmes, a complete list of which will be submitted in our next issue.

The comparative merit of the programmes sent in will be decided by a board of three judges, and the competition will close on Oct. 1, 1899.

G. W. M., Waymart, Pa. Frequently I have heard ministers in sermons state that "Alexander wept because there were no more worlds to [illegible] he was informed by his wise men that there was a number of worlds, he wept because he had not been able to conquer one." Now which is correct?

The incident is related in various ways and one is as likely to be correct as the other.

Subscriber, New Bedford. What was Paul's "thorn in the flesh?"

There has been a considerable difference of opinion as to what he really meant. Some commentators believe he referred to defective eyesight; others, to his diminutive stature or his poor delivery. His remark that the Galatians would, if it had been possible, have plucked out their own eyes and given them to him (Gal. 4: 15), seems to indicate that the trouble was with his sight.

B. M. McQ., Norway, Ia. What is the view taken [illegible]

We have repeatedly answered a similar query. While dancing, in itself, may be harmless, and, in moderation, even beneficial, it must be condemned by all thoughtful Christian people, for the reason that it involves promiscuous and therefore dangerous acquaintanceship, and that modern dances are objectionable on other grounds. In a countless multitude of cases, the ball-room has proved the first step to moral and physical ruin. On the other hand, no one has ever heard of a single instance where dancing could be regarded as morally helpful. On the general principle that any amusement which is in the nature of a stumbling-block to spiritual growth should be avoided, [illegible] would do well to omit dancing al[illegible] the list of innocent recreations.

GREAT RELIGIOUS ACTIVITY IN OUR ISLAND POSSESSIONS — ENCOURAGING LETTERS FROM CHRISTIAN WORKERS IN THE FIELD

NEXT to the establishment of a system of government satisfactory to the population, and calculated to develop the industries of Porto Rico and bring happiness and prosperity to the island, the most important and immediate task which confronts us in that part of our new West Indian domain is the introduction of a proper school system and the establishment of religious freedom throughout the length and breadth of the little island. Gen. John Eaton, whose official mission to Porto Rico was referred to in a recent issue of this journal, is charged by the United States Government with the important duty of planning such an educational system for the island population as may seem to be best suited to its peculiar needs, and his long experience as United States Commissioner of Education gives assurance that the work will be well and thoroughly performed. Beside this, he has undertaken to cooperate with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in its efforts to open Sunday Schools throughout the island, and as he is now doubtless busily engaged in familiarizing himself with the new territory and its people, we may expect shortly to have definite information from him on this important subject. In his latest letter in these columns, published a week ago, he wrote that a very large proportion of the population was illiterate, and indicated in general terms the program likely to be followed in providing for the secular education of adults and children. "The children," he wrote, "are specially bright," and in that fact lay the bow of promise for the future.

Our photographer, in the illustrations on this page (which were taken specially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD), has presented some very interesting scenes of recent date. The presentation of an American flag by the native school children is an evidence of the prevalent popular sentiment, which from the very first has been exceedingly friendly toward our government and people. Porto Rico has suffered less from the horrors of war than any of the other lost colonies of Spain, prompt submission to American authority having spared its people the scenes of devastation and misery that occurred in Cuba and the Philippines.

A recent writer on Porto Rico has estimated that of the total population 96,000 can read and write, 14,000 can read only, and 695,000 are wholly unable to do either. This, however, is probably a somewhat exaggerated estimate. In San Juan, the capital, with a population of 25,000, there are 5,000 school children and less than twenty teachers. These facts, taken in connection with the character of the education given under Spanish rule, make it clear that the educational task is of the highest and most immediate importance.

Y. M. C. A. Progress at San Juan

Religious services are conducted in the public theatre of San Juan every Sunday morning, which are attended by the Commanding General, Guy V. Henry, and many other officers. The soldiers are present in goodly numbers. The choir, which has been formed through the exertions of Mrs. P. C. Hanna, wife of the United States Consul, consists of Americans, officers and others. A Sunday School has been organized in the theatre, previous to the morning service, and is attended by many soldiers. The workers are largely from the Army Headquarters and Departments. Both these services, although conducted at considerable expense, have been self-supporting from the beginning. Secretary Frank L. Smith, of the Y. M. C. A., has had supervision of the public services. Large numbers of Porto Ricans are being reached. An address in Spanish is always a part of the program, and the hymns used in Sunday School are printed in Spanish on separate slips. The Army and Navy edition of "Sacred Songs" is used, and over 500 copies have found their way from the theatre to the homes of the people.

It is a common sight to see a group of young fellows in the street trying to acquire the English of the Gospel Hymns through this medium. Last Sunday, Rev. Dr. Ward, of New York, spoke for a few minutes, after a sermon from Rev. H. A. Brown, Post-Chaplain. A regular Sunday service has been organized at the general hospital, beginning January 1, which is attended by convalescents, hospital stewards, and nurses, and the hymns are heard by nearly all the sick in contiguous wards. Since the beginning of this service, Chaplain Sherman (son of the late Gen. W. T. Sherman), has expressed a desire to share the work on Sunday, and it has been arranged to alternate in holding the meetings.

By the co-operation of some Christian men headed by Private Harry W. Smith, of Company K, and the permission of Colonel DeRussy, Secretary F. C. Smith, has established a Sunday afternoon meeting at the Barracks of the 11th U. S. Infantry. At each service some one remains for prayer.

An Army and Navy Y. M. C. A. will soon be established in San Juan. Mr. Smith writes that he hopes in a few days to begin this very important work, endeavoring to counteract the influence of hundreds of cafes where intoxicating drink is sold. It is proposed to organize Bible classes, circles of study in the Spanish language, and occasional social entertainments.

PRESENTATION OF AN AMERICAN FLAG BY THE SCHOOL CHILDREN OF SAN JUAN, PORTO RICO

Religious Work in the Philippines

Major J. B. Ketchum, Cor.-Secretary of the U. S. Soldiers Christian Aid Association, of New York City, is in constant correspondence with the U. S. Chaplain at Manila, in the Philippines. He sends a letter to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, from Division Chaplain Charles C. Pierce, U. S. Army, giving late news of religious work at Manila. Here is the letter:

MANILA, P. I., January 31.

MY DEAR MAJ. KETCHUM: Your good letter of November 10, was received a few days ago; and, also, a very large assortment of papers. I gave the latter to the sick men in the hospital, by whom such things are eagerly devoured; and, in this case, there was no exception.

I was surprised to find my last letter in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD; but I hope your kind action in placing it there will cause the churches at home to take the Philippine work up as actively as the needs demand.

Our Anglo-Spanish Mission, which I started in August last, is improving rapidly, and we must soon have money for land and building. Christmas morning, I gave the first service that has yet been offered the Filipinos, having had a part of the service translated into Spanish, which the better classes understand. There were fully 150 natives present, and they looked and listened with the greatest interest.

This work has begun amid the intensest opposition on the part of the former religious monopolists, and it is possible that I may be broken down in it. But I count that morning's service as the greatest of my life; and if I go down, physically, or as a result of calumny, there will be whole regiments of workers to take my place. The first great necessary is a cemetery where these people can be buried, when they consent to face the results of excommunication. They cannot be buried in a Roman cemetery, and there are no others open for them. We must have one. I have been negotiating for a place, and will have papers completed next week. The Provost-Marshal General has approved the location, and the enterprise. I am trying to raise at least, $3,800, or $4,000, and asking my friends to pay for the ground at the rate of $1.00 per square yard; so that we can say to the natives: "Fear not what man may do unto you! Here is a place where you can be laid to rest when God calls you, and without fee for a priest, or pay for land; in it you shall be buried; not on the Spanish plan, of yearly rental on penalty of removal to the bone-pile, when payment fails, but on the good American plan, with assurance of retaining undisputed possession till God's angels sound your reveille!"

Spanish Testaments, or Bibles, I could use, by the thousand. Spanish tracts are a necessity. Episcopal hymnals and prayer-books would be most welcome.

My medical work has reached very large proportions: I have given medicines to over 1,000 of the natives, absolutely free of charge; and this has not only given me a large circle of friends, but has afforded a wonderful opportunity to let in a little gospel light. Pray for me and the work, and write whenever you can.

CHARLES C. PIERCE,
Division Chaplain, U. S. Army.

Major Ketchum says his society has subscribed for one hundred square feet towards the proposed free cemetery, and has also taken steps to supply the Chaplain's further needs. Any one desiring to aid may write to U. S. Soldiers Christian Aid Association, 40 and 42 Broadway, New York City.

In view of the exciting events now occurring at Manila, this letter from a Christian soldier will be found interesting:

MANILA, P. I., Jan. 9.

Editor "The Christian Herald":

On the Calle de Iris in this city stands the Zorilla theatre, in which are stationed two companies of the Tenth Pennsylvania regiment. Since the occupation of the city this building has been used for the joint Sunday evening services of the Colorado and Pennsylvania regiments, which are quartered near each other. Here, where for years the degenerating amusements of the Spanish stage have inflamed the minds and passions of the populace, a Christmas and a New Year's service were held that perhaps did not have their like in Christendom. Large palms and ferns, with young banana trees, from which hung clusters of long trailing vines, transformed the place into a small tropical Eden. Above the stage was the Christmas motto: "On earth peace, good-will toward men," and as the boys in white (not blue) gathered there Christmas night and saluted the flag that hung in the wilderness of green and bared their heads in homage to their God, these words must have gone with deep significance to every heart.

Y. M. C. A. HEADQUARTERS, SAN JUAN

No studied sermon was preached; none was needed, for Chaplains Fleming and Hunter spoke eloquently yet simply of our friends at home, of our mission, our duty, and hearts were touched that night as they perhaps had never been before.

A green Christmas, a green New Year — two days that will ever be green in the memories of brothers who send their greeting over ten thousand miles of land and sea.

Tent Work in Manila

Cheering reports of Gospel work in the Philippines are sent in this letter from the Christian Commission secretaries:

MANILA, Philippine Islands, Dec. 5.

The past month was unusually rainy and stormy, making life in the tent less agreeable and the attendance very low. On Nov. 13, a typhoon passed near the city and the tent was blown down, without, however, very serious damage, aside from broken ropes and ripped canvas. Since reerecting the tent, the weather has moderated and the delightful winter so long promised seems to have come.

On Nov. 8, in company with Mr. B. C. Randall, of the British and Foreign Bible Society, a trip was made to Dagupan, Province of Pangasman, 120 miles north of Manila, for the purpose of distributing 1,200 Gospels in the Pangasman dialect. Through Mr. Randall, a supply of Spanish Bibles, Testaments and Gospels was secured for sale, which is being disposed of gradually.

During the past few weeks, the remaining troops of the Eighth Army Corps have arrived, making a total of 22,000 American troops in the city, and thus making the work of the Christian Commission more important. Especially so is it when we consider the rapid increase of the liquor traffic in the city since its occupancy by the American troops. On the Escolta, the principal business street, only one-quarter of a mile long, there were but two places where intoxicating liquors were sold when we entered the city; now there are eighteen. There are 300 licensed places in all. To counteract these pernicious influences, there are, in the city, only two places dedicated to Protestant Christian work—the tents of the Army Y. M. C. A. Besides these, the chaplain holds services with the different regiments.

The report is signed by F. A. Jackson and Charles A. Glunz, secretaries of the Christian Commission.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

The Bundle of Life

A Sermon by T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text, I. Samuel 25: 29, . . .

The soul of my lord shall be bound in the bundle of life with the Lord thy God

BEAUTIFUL Abigail, in her rhythmic plea for the rescue of her inebriate husband, who died within ten days, addresses David, the Warrior, in the words of the text. She suggests that his life, physically, and intellectually, and spiritually, is a valuable package or bundle, divinely bound up and to be divinely protected.

That phrase "bundle of life" I heard many times in my father's family prayers. Family prayers, you know, have frequent repetitions, because day by day they acknowledge about the same blessings, and deplore about the same frailties, and sympathize with about the same misfortunes, and I do not know why those who lead at household devotions should seek variety of composition. That familiar prayer becomes the household liturgy. I would not give one of my old father's prayers for fifty elocutionary supplications. Again and again, in the morning and evening prayer, I heard the request that we might all be bound up in the bundle of life, but I did not know until a few days ago that the phrase was a Bible phrase.

Now, the more I think of it the better I like it. Bundle of Life! It is such a simple and unpretending, yet expressive comparison. There is nothing like grandiloquence in the Scriptures. While there are many sublime passages in Holy Writ, there are more passages homely and drawing illustrations from common observation and every-day life. In Christ's great sermons you hear a hen clucking her chickens together, and see the photographs of hypocrites with a sad countenance, and hear of the grass of the field, and the black crows, which our heavenly Father feeds, and the salt that is worthless, and the precious stones flung under the feet of swine, and the shifting sand that lets down the house with a great crash, and hear the comparison of the text, the most unpoetical thing we can think of—a bundle. Ordinarily it is something tossed about, something thrown under the table, something that suggests garrets, or something on the shoulder of a poor wayfarer. But there are bundles of great value, bundles put up with great caution, bundles, the loss of which means consternation and despair, and there have been bundles representing the worth of a kingdom.

During the last spell of cold weather there were bundles that attracted the attention and the plaudits of the high heavens, bundles of clothing on the way from comfortable homes to the door of the mission-room, and Christ stood in the snow-banks and said, as the bundles passed: "Naked, and ye clothed me. Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye have done it unto me." Those bundles are multiplying. Blessings on those who pack them. Blessings on those who distribute them. Blessings on those who receive them.

With what beautiful aptitude did Abigail, in my text, speak of the bundle of life! Oh, what a precious bundle is life! Bundle of memories, bundle of hopes, bundle of ambitions, bundle of destinies! Once in a while a man writes his autobiography, and it is of thrilling interest. The story of his birth-place, the story of his struggles, the story of his sufferings, the story of his triumphs! But if the autobiography of the most eventful life were well written, it would make many chapters of adventure, of tragedy, of comedy, and there would not be an uninteresting step from cradle to grave.

Bundle of memories are you! Boyhood memories—with all its injustices from playmates, with all its games with ball and bat and kite and sled. Manhood memories, with all your struggles in starting—obstacles, oppositions, accidents, misfortunes, losses, successes. Memories of the first marriage you ever saw solemnized; of the first grave you ever saw opened; of the first mighty wrong you ever suffered; of the first victory you ever gained! Memory of the hour when you were affianced; memory of the first advent in your home; memory of the roseate cheek faded and of blue eyes closed in the last sleep; memory of anthem and of dirge; memory of great pain and of slow convalescence; memory of times when all things were against you; memory of prosperities that came in like the full tide of the sea; memories of a life-time! What a bundle!

I lift that bundle to-day and unloose the cord that binds it, and for a moment you look in and see tears, and smiles, and laughter, and groans, and noondays and midnights of experience; and then I tie again the bundle with heart-strings that have some time vibrated with joy and anon been thrummed by fingers of woe.

Bundle of hopes, and ambitions also, is almost every man and woman, especially at the starting. What gains he will harvest, or what reputation he will achieve, or what bliss he will reach, or what love he will win. Oh, what a magnificent bundle of hopes and ambitions! It is a bundle of garlands and sceptres from which I would not take one sprig of mignonette nor extinguish one spark of brilliance. They who start life without bright hopes and inspiring ambitions, might as well not start at all, for every step will be a failure. Rather would I add to the bundle, and if I open it now it will not be because I wish to take anything from it, but that I may put into it more coronets and hosannas.

Bundle of faculties in every man and every woman! Power to think—to think of the past and through all the future; to think upward and higher than the highest pinnacle of heaven, or to think downward until there is no lower abysm to fathom. Power to think right, power to think wrong, power to think forever; for, once having begun to think, there shall be no terminus for that exercise, and eternity itself shall have no power to bid it halt. Faculties to love—filial love, conjugal love, paternal love, maternal love, love of country, love of God. Faculty of judgment, with scales so delicate and yet so mighty they can weigh arguments, weigh emotions, weigh worlds, weigh heaven and hell. Faculty of will, that can climb mountains or tunnel them, wade seas or bridge them, accepting eternal enthronement or choosing everlasting exile. Oh, what it is to be a man! Oh, what it is to be a woman! Sublime and infinite bundle of faculties! The thought of it staggers me, swamps me, stuns me, bewilders me, overwhelms me. Oh, what a bundle of life Abigail of my text saw in David, and which we ought to see in every human, yet immortal, being!

Know, also, that this bundle of life was put up with great care. Any merchant and almost any faithful householder will tell you how much depends on the way a bundle is bound. The cord or rope must be strong enough to hold: the knot must be well tied. You know not what rough hands may toss that bundle. If not properly put together though, it may leave your hands in good order and symmetrical, before it reaches its proper destination it may be loosened in fragments for the winds to scatter or the rail train to lose.

Now, I have to tell you that this bundle of life is well put together, for [illegible] Who but the Almighty could put such a bundle? Anatomists, physiologists, physicists, logicians, metaphysicians, declare that we are fearfully and wonderfully made. That by the amount of journeying we can endure without damage, by the amount of rough handling we can survive, by the fact that the vast majority of us go through life without the loss of an eye, or the crippling of a limb, or the destruction of a single energy of body or faculty of mind. Was there ever such a complete bundle put together as the human being? What a factory! What an engine! What a mill-race! What a light-house! What a locomotive! What an electric battery! What a furnace! What a masterpiece of the Lord God Almighty! Or, to employ the anti-climax and use the figure of the text, what a bundle!

Know, also, that this bundle of life is properly directed. Many a bundle has missed its way and disappeared because the address has dropped, and no one can find by examination for what city or town or neighborhood it was intended. All great carrying companies have so many mis-directed packages, that they appoint days of vendue to dispose of them. All intelligent people know the importance of having a valuable package plainly directed, the name of the one to whom it is to go plainly written. Baggage-master and expressman ought to know at the first glance to whom to take it.

This bundle of life that Abigail, in my text, speaks of is plainly addressed. By divine penmanship it is directed heavenward. However long may be the earthly distance it travels, its destination is the eternal city of God on high. Every mile it goes away from that direction, is by some human or infernal fraud practised against it. There are those who put it on some other track, who misplace it in some wrong conveyance, who send it off or send it back by some diabolic miscarriage. The value of that bundle is so well known all up and down the universe that there are a million dishonest hands which are trying to detain, or divert it, or to forever stop its progress in the right direction. There are so many influences abroad to ruin your body, mind and soul, that my wonder is not that so many are destroyed for this world and the next, but that there are not more who go down irremediably.

Every human being is assailed at the start. Within an hour of the time when this bundle of life is made up the assault begins. First of all, there are the infantile disorders that threaten the body just launched upon earthly existence. Scarlet fevers, and pneumonias, and diphtherias, and influenzas, and the whole pack of epidemics surround the cradle and threaten its occupant; and infant Moses in the ark of bulrushes was not more imperilled by the monsters of the Nile, than every cradle is imperilled by ailments all-devouring. In after years there are foes within and foes without. Evil appetite joined by outside allurements. Temptations that have utterly destroyed more people than now inhabit the earth. Gambling saloons, and rummeries, and places where dissoluteness reigns supreme, enough in number to go round, and round, and round the earth. Discouragements, jealousies, revenges, malevolences, disappointments, swindles, arsons, conflagrations and cruelties which make continued existence of the human race a wonderment. Was any valuable bundle ever so imperilled as this bundle of life? O look at the address, and get that bundle going in the right way! "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and soul, and mind, and strength." Heaven with its twelve gates standing wide open with invitation. All the forces of the Godhead pledged for our heavenly arrival if we will do the right thing. All angeldom ready for our advance and guidance. All the lightnings of heaven so many drawn swords for our protection. What a pity, what an everlasting pity, if this bundle of life, so well bound and so plainly directed, does not come out at the right station, but becomes a lost bundle, cast out amid the rubbish of the universe!

Know, also, that a bundle may have in it more than one invaluable. There may be in it a photograph of a loved one and a jewel for a carcanet. It may contain an embroidered robe and a Doré's illus- [illegible] Abigail [illegible] David. The same [illegible] life [illegible] with the Lord thy God," and Abigail [illegible] We may be bound up with a living, sympathetic God. We may be as sure to [illegible] two valuables in the same bundle. To- [illegible] time of joy. Together on earth. Together in heaven. Close companionship of God. Hear him: "I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee." "For the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee." Yes, we have [illegible] and sympathetic God will move away from us if we love and trust him. O, if we could realize that according to my text we may be bound up with that God, how independent it would make us of things that now harass, and annoy, and discompose, and torment us. Instead of a grasshopper being a burden, a world of care would be as light as a feather, and [illegible] position we would smite down hip and thigh with great slaughter.

A God away up in the heavens is not much consolation to us when we get into life's struggle. It is a God close by, as near to us as any two articles of apparel were near to each other in that bundle that you sent the other day to that shivering home, through whose roof the snow sifted and through whose broken window pane the night winds howled. It was sanctified irony and holy sarcasm that Elijah used when he told the idolaters of Baal to pray louder, saying that their god might be asleep, or talking, or on a journey, or gone ahunting; but our God is always wide awake, and always hears, and is always close by, and to him a whisper of prayer is as loud as an archangel's trumpet, and a child's "Now I lay me down to sleep" is as easily heard by him as the prayer of the great Scotchman amid the highlands when pursued by Lord Claverhouse's miscreants. The covenanter said: "O, Lord, cast the lap of thy cloak about these children of the covenant," and a mountain fog instantly hid the pursued from their bloodthirsty pursuers. I proclaim him a God close by. When we are tempted to do wrong, when we have questions of livelihood too much for us, when we put our darlings into the last sleep, when we are overwhelmed with physical distresses, when we are perplexed about what next to do, when we come into combat with the king of terrors, we want a God close by. How do you like the doctrine of the text: "Bound in the bundle of life with the Lord thy God?"

Know, also, that this bundle of life will be gladly received when it comes to the door of the Mansion for which it was bound and plainly directed. With what alacrity and glee we await some package that has been foretold by letter: some holiday presentation: something that will enrich and ornament our home: some testimony of admiration and affection! With what glow of expectation we untie the knot and take off the cord that holds it together in safety, and with what glad exclamation we unroll the covering, and see the gift or purchase in all its beauty of color and proportion. Well, what a day it will be when your precious bundle of life shall be opened in the "House of Many Mansions," amid saintly and angelic and divine inspection! The bundle may be spotted with the marks of much exposure: it may bear inscription after inscription to tell through what ordeal it has passed: perhaps splashed of wave and scorched of flame, but all it has within undamaged of the journey. And with what shouts of joy the bundle of life will be greeted by all the voices of the heavenly home circle!

In our anxiety at last to reach heaven we are apt to lose sight of the glee or welcome that awaits us if we get in at all. We all have friends up there. They will somehow hear that we are coming. Such close and swift and constant communication is there between those up lands and these low-lands that we will not surprise them by sudden arrival. If loved ones on earth expect our coming visit and are at the depot with carriage to meet us, surely we will be met at the shining gate by old friends now sainted and kindred now glorified. If there were no angel of God to meet us and show us the palaces and guide us to our everlasting residence, these kindred would show us the way and point out the splendors and guide us to our celestial home, bowered, and fountained, and arched, and illumined by a sun that never sets. Will it not be glorious, the going in and the settling down after all the moving about and upsettings of earthly experience. We will soon know all our neighbors, kingly, queenly, prophetic, apostolic, seraphic, archangelic. The precious bundle of life opened amid palaces, and grand marches, and acclamations. They will all be so glad we have got safely through. They saw us down here in the struggle. They saw us when we lost our way. They knew when we got off the right course. None of the thirty-two ships that were overdue at New York harbor in the storm of week before last were greeted so heartily by friends, on the dock or the steam tugs that went out to meet them at Sandy Hook, as we will be greeted in the heavenly world, if by the pardoning and protecting grace of God we come to celestial wharfage. We shall have to tell them of the many wrecks that we have passed on the way across wild seas, and amid Caribbean cyclones. It will be like our arrival some years ago from New Zealand at Sydney, Australia; people surprised that we got in at all, because we were two days late, and some of the ships expected had gone to the bottom, and we had passed derelicts and abandoned crafts all up and down that awful channel,—our arrival in heaven all the more rapturously welcomed, because of the doubt as to whether we would ever get there at all.

Once there it will be found that the safety of that precious bundle of life was assured because it was bound up with the life of God in Jesus Christ. Heaven could not afford to have that bundle lost, because it had been said in regard to its transportation and safe arrival, "Kept by the power of God through faith unto complete salvation." Oh! I cannot tell you how I feel about it, the thought is so glorious. Bound up with God. Bound up with infinite mercy. Bound up with infinite joy. Bound up with infinite purity. Bound up with infinite might. That thought is more beautiful and glorious than was the heroic Abigail, who at the foot of the crags uttered it—"Bound in the bundle of life with the Lord thy God!"

Now, my hearer and reader, appeciate the value of that bundle. See that it is bound up with nothing mean, but with the unsullied and the immaculate. Not with a pebble of the shifting beach, but with the kohinoor of the palace; not with some fading regalia of earthly pomp, but with the robe washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb. Pray as you never prayed before, that by divine chirography written all over your nature, you may be properly addressed for a glorious destination. Turn not over a new leaf of the old book, but by the grace of God open an entirely new volume of experience, and put into practice the advice contained in the peculiar but beautiful rhythm of some author whose name I know not:

If you've any task to do,
Let me whisper, friend, to you,
Do it.
If you've anything to say,
True and needed, yea or nay,
Say it.
If you've anything to love,
As a blessing from above,
Love it.
If you've anything to give,
That another's joy may live,
Give it.
If some hollow creed you doubt,
Tho' the whole world hoot and shout,
Doubt it.
If you've any debt to pay,
Rest you neither night nor day,
Pay it.
If you've any joy to hold,
Near your heart, lest it grow cold
Hold it.
If you've any grief to meet,
At a loving Father's feet,
Meet it.
If you know what torch to light,
Guiding others in the night,
Light it.

Among African Cannibals

Dr. Nassau Tells of the Progress of Civilization in West Africa—Native Tribes That Are Slowly Emerging from Barbarism

(From a Special Correspondent)

IT is now fifty-six years since the Gospel was first brought to Libreville, and the Baraka Mission house, built in 1842 by the late Rev. J. Leighton Wilson, D.D., and subsequently under the hands of his successors (men who have since died), Rev. William Walker and Rev. Albert Bushnell, D.D., until it passed under my care six years ago, grows steadily though slowly; in membership now numbering eighty. Among these members are the grandchildren of some of Dr. Wilson's first converts; men and women who are ladies and gentlemen, in speech, manner, dress and conduct, the equals of some of the missionary teachers. And by their sides, in the same seats at my Sabbath services, are others who only a few years ago emerged from pure heathenism. This singular state of affairs makes the Gaboon Church unique among the eleven churches of Corisco Presbytery, and justifies the holding of a special English service for the educated and civilized portion. In the community of Libreville there is a large element that is not heathen, yet is not educated (but few of them having cared to learn to read, or, being satisfied with Catholic baptism and the handling of the rosary), who nevertheless call themselves "civilized." They have seized on the externals of our civilization—its varnish, its dress, shoes and parasols—but cling to the country customs, and even to some of its superstitions.

DR. PELISSIER AND A PARTY OF EX-CANNIBAL CHIEFS OF THE FANG TRIBE

The photograph which I send shows a group of a chief and his sub-chiefs of the Fang tribe under the control of the French administrator, Doctor Pelissier, at the government post Njoli, on the Ogowe river. Njoli is five miles up river from my former mission station of Talaguga, and was located after I had built my Talaguga home. That station is now in the hands of my friend, Rev. E. Allegret; it, with all other successful Ogowe stations and churches having, under the unwise counsels of that time, been transferred seven years ago to the care of the Paris Evangelical Society; unwise, because the reasons for leaving the Ogowe soon ceased, and do not now exist; and, also, because the promises made as grounds for removal to the German territory of Batanga, have mostly been proved illusory. My regret at having yielded assent to the transfer of a field which had fruited so richly to my sixteen years of travel, pioneering, teaching, preaching, sowing and ingathering, is not that it has not passed into good hands, but that I gave up so much unnecessarily.

Last July, I visited Talaguga, and was delighted with what I saw of Brother Allegret's work. My visit was a literal rejoicing together of sower and reaper. With an unselfishness that is somewhat rare, he met my cordial recognition of his enlargement, by a generous acknowledgment of my pioneering days. I had chosen the site of Talaguga for its excellent water, good landing and other reasons, though there were very few people there. I knew people would come. I knew of the wave of population that was steadily and inevitably pushing itself from the Fang interior. Standing in their pathway at a strategic point, I was sure that a few years would bring that wave to break around me. The French government recognized that same strategic point: and, following my precedent, erected their post five miles from me at Njoli. That Fang wave did come. Now, where in 1882 were only a few hundreds, there are by actual count 10,000; and the narrow strip of land at the foot of Talaguga Hill, that sufficed for my first home, and where, with the aid of a French assistant, M. V. Gacon, was built the present successful saw-mill, became too small for Brother Allegret's school of a hundred boys; and he has added to the original Talaguga an adjacent island as the site for larger dwelling houses for his three white assistants, and for his schoolboys and girls. Those Fang in the photo were in 1882 cannibals, gaunt and wild and almost naked; their constantly-carried guns meant readiness for instant quarrel and instant bloodshed. They are "clothed" now, and some of them "in their right mind." Their still constantly-carried guns are largely ornamental. The people who, in 1882, looked on my coming with indifference to my message, but keen to know what wealth the white man would bring them, contributed last year for Brother Allegret's church work over five hundred dollars. R. H. NASSAU.

Silent Messengers

Little did anyone think, five years ago, when the Bible Institute Colportage Association, Chicago, was organized by Mr. Moody, that by this time nearly three million helpful and inspiring books would have been issued. But that is the immense number of volumes, comprising the editions of very excellent books, written by Spurgeon, Chapman, Meyer, Talmage, MacNeil and others, that this Association has put out, and such has been the success of that Christian enterprise which was begun by Mr. Moody in connection with the Bible Institute for Home and Foreign Missions in November, 1894.

The principal publication is a monthly one known as the Colportage Library, being a series of uplifting books for general reading. The Library has won for itself a deserved place in the Christian literature of the day, presenting as it does in cheap, yet desirable form, the best thoughts of the best men in the evangelical world. The range of matter presented includes short stories, addresses, sermons, anectodes, etc. Fundamental doctrines are popularly treated, but all are thoroughly evangelistic and unsectarian. Sixty or more different books of this series are in the English language, and others of them are published in German, Swedish, and Danish-Norwegian.

The books have gone into every State and territory and many foreign countries. More than 250,000 have been distributed to the men and women confined in our penal institutions. The need of such work is very great, and experience has shown that it is a kind of Christian labor that is frequently overlooked. Every earnest effort put forth to provide good or better reading matter for the prisoners, has been very much appreciated by this class. Those thus confined have necessarily plenty of time to think and read, and as Mr. Moody says; "It is just the nick of time to save them."

Light on Bible History

Professor Sayce Tells of Recent Explorations that Corroborate the Story of the Exodus

FEW men of the present century have rendered services of greater value to Christian scholarship than Prof. A. H. Sayce, LL.D., whose explorations and writings have shed a flood of light upon the pages of the Holy Book. In his latest contribution to the literature of exploration and discovery in Bible lands, he tells some things of remarkable interest, by far the most striking being the finding of confirmatory evidence of the Exodus, and the probable identification of the Pharaoh of the Oppression. He writes:

"Little by little, the past history of Egypt has been patiently built up by the help of its fragmentary monuments, but the student of the Old Testament looked to it almost in vain for help or illustration. When the Egypt Exploration fund was first started, the names of the places in Palestine conquered by Shishak in the fifth year of Rehoboam were practically all that the Egyptologist had found relating to Old Testament history. We are better off now. Dr. Naville has discovered the site of Goshen; he has also discovered the site of Pithom (the treasure city) and the fact that it was built by Rameses II. of the nineteenth dynasty, thus making it clear that the latter monarch must have been the Pharaoh of the Oppression. The discovery of the tablets of Tel-el-Amarna, moreover, has indirectly had an important bearing on the history of the Exodus. They have proved that Moses lived in the midst of a literary age, and that consequently it would have been little short of a miracle if he had not known how to write; they have further explained the political causes which brought about both the Oppression and the Exodus, as well as the rise of the 'new king which knew not Joseph.' Finally, Jeremiah's description of Tahpanhes has been verified by Prof. Flinders Petrie's excavations at Tel-ed-Defneh, where the very pavement of brick alluded to by the prophet has been found; and on a stela of Meneptah, the son and successor of Rameses II., found by the same explorer at Thebes, the name of the 'Israelites' themselves occurs. They are declared to have been left 'without a seed,' almost in the words of the book of Exodus, and, as has been lately pointed out by Dr. Naville, the manner in which they are mentioned and the fact that no determinative of 'country' is attached to their name, imply that they had already been lost to sight in the recesses of the wilderness. As for Joseph, the change he is stated in the book of Genesis to have effected in the tenure of land in Egypt is abundantly confirmed by the monuments. During the dominion of the foreign Hyksos princes the old landed proprietors became extinct, and their estates passed into the hands of the Pharaoh or the priests. The change, we thus learn, actually took place, and the cause of it is given us in the history of Joseph.
